incapable of ratification.² A voidable contract is one in which one party has the privilege of making the contract either valid or void at his pleasure.³ The party to whom the law gives this choice possesses a right in the nature of an equitable election; and upon asserting the right, and making the contract either void or valid, the right is exhausted and cannot afterwards be exercised even if the party wishes to change his mind and to take a different attitude in respect to the validity of the contract. Ratification prevents subsequent disaffirmance,⁴ and disaffirmance prevents subsequent ratification.⁵ Before passing on to the further discussion of these words, it may here be noted that while the authorities and definitions generally limit voidable contracts to those in which one party may exercise his right of repudiating his liability, no reason appears why there may not be a voidable contract in which each party has on grounds peculiar to himself a right of avoiding the contract.⁶

The use of the terms void and voidable as indicating an accurate and reliable classification of contracts is always unsatisfactory and often misleading. In the first place the two words are often misused, being employed indiscriminately. The word void is the more frequently misused. In statutes, decisions and sometimes even in text-books, a contract is said to be void, when the context shows that it is merely voidable; that is, that one party to it may avoid it or make it valid at his option, but that the other party and all third persons are alike bound by it if the party having the right to avoid it sees fit not to do so.⁷ In the second place, even where the two terms are not confused, neither is accurate as to the ultimate effect of the transaction. A void contract may be simply ineffective for all purposes. On the other hand, title to property may pass as a part of the transaction. In this case the practical question is usually whether the former owner can recover his property or whether the law will leave the parties in the situation in which they have voluntarily placed themselves. A voidable contract may also have different meanings according to its legal effect. In some contracts, the party may avoid without restoring any part of the consideration received which has been lost, wasted or squandered. In others he can avoid only upon restoring everything which he has received under the contract. For these reasons we are often obliged to distinguish between contracts which are merely void and those which are illegal.⁸ It must further be observed that there is such a thing as a contract valid in itself which may on account of special circumstances be unenforceable.⁹ Illustrations of contracts of this type will be given later. Most of such contracts fall within the terms of the Statute of Frauds.¹⁰ The term "unenforceable" is therefore wider than "void" since it includes all void contracts and some valid ones. So the term "void" is wider than "illegal": since all illegal contracts are void; while many are void that are not illegal.

§21. Nomenclature of the law.

It may be added that in one sense accuracy of nomenclature is very important. Since ideas are expressed by words, misuse of words is likely to result in confusion of thought. In another sense it is of no importance. If the idea to be con-voiced is clearly understood, discussion of the language in which it should be expressed usually involves time and energy that might be better employed. It must be confessed that the nomenclature of our law is defective. Such technical terms as it has are for the most part borrowed from popular language. It is, therefore, rare to find them possessed of that accuracy of meaning that the more artificial terms of science enjoy. Still, as the courts are unwilling to accept suggestions for a more artificial and accurate nomenclature, we must strive to use the terms actually employed with such accuracy as is possible.

THE FORMATION OF THE SIMPLE CONTRACT [EXCLUDING PARTIES].

OFFER AND ACCEPTANCE.

§22. Agreement essential element of contract.

Since a contract is an agreement resulting in obligation and enforceable at law,¹ agreement is an essential element of every genuine contract.² This proposition is true of all contracts properly so called, though it has no application to those liabilities which arise without any agreement but which are classed with contracts for the historical reason that they were enforced at Common Law by an action in assumpsit.³ It is so true that it might be dismissed as a truism but for peculiarities in its application to particular states of fact.

Agreement is usually reached by some form of offer on the one side and acceptance on the other, and thus it is often said that agreement can be reached only in this way.¹ Agreement may probably be reached in other ways. Pollock's illustration of a suggestion made by a third party and acquiesced in at the same time by the two adversary parties to the contract is undoubtedly a correct example of an agreement which does not originate in offer and acceptance.² Still it is true that the great majority of contracts consist of enforceable agreements which originate in offer and acceptance, though in many cases an offer and acceptance which are not consciously formulated by the parties, and which must be artificially deduced from prolonged negotiations, but which really form both logically and legally the method of reaching the agreement. For practical purposes, therefore, agreement in contract law may be considered as created solely by offer and acceptance.

§24. Nature of offer — must purport creation of legal liability.

The offer which by acceptance can become an agreement, as the term is used in law, must possess certain qualities differentiating it from the general class of offers commonly so called. First. It must purport to create liabilities which are legally enforceable. Thus it is often said that offers purely social or religious in their nature cannot form the basis of a contract even if all the other elements are present.¹ So a mere declaration of non-liability in a railroad ticket not purporting to be a part of the contract of transportation is not treated as a term thereof.²

§25. Must show intention to assume liability.

Second. The offer must be so made as to indicate a real intention to assume liability. An offer made in jest and known to be made in jest by the party accepting it, cannot be the basis of any legal liability. Thus a marriage ceremony intended by both parties as a jest,¹ or the giving of a check for three hundred dollars for a watch worth fifteen, both parties intending the transaction as a joke and neither intending a sale of the watch,² are both without legal effect. However, both parties must understand such a joke. An offer made in jest is enforceable by one who accepts it bona fide as a serious proposition.³ So a statement, made in anger and so understood, cannot be treated as a technical offer.⁴

Further, a mere statement of intention to act in a certain manner, not showing any intent to incur a legal liability so to act, is not an offer in this sense.⁵ Thus a statement of intention to recompense one by will for services rendered;⁶ a letter by a devisee stating that he is willing that another devisee should keep the land;⁷ a statement made before marriage by the prospective husband to the effect that he expected to keep control of certain premises as a home for their joint lives and for the life of his wife if she survives him;⁸ a statement by a lessor of a gas well that he would rather reduce the rental than have the well pulled;⁹ a city ordinance, for the protection of the city, which imposes on trustees of gas works the obligation of paying money into the sinking fund;¹⁰ a vote of a council that certain

lots owned by the city be sold; the purchasers being required to agree to build houses of a certain value on such lots within a certain time;¹¹ an ordinance passed by council appropriating funds and employing an attorney, which is vetoed by the mayor;¹² a resolution of a city council recommending the acceptance of an offer concerning the dissolution of an injunction;¹³ a resolution of a board authorizing their chairman to purchase certain land;¹⁴ a statute forbidding county courts from licensing ferries within half a mile of an established ferry;¹⁵ are none of them offers and cannot be so accepted as to become agreements.¹⁶ So a statement by a military officer that the government would probably give a reward for the return of certain Indians is not an offer.¹⁷

A communication between principal and agent, not intended on its face as an offer to a third person to enter into legal relations with him, cannot be accepted by him on learning of its existence, so as to become an agreement.¹⁸ Thus a report of a town committee appointed to consider a claim against the town, which fixes the amount of the claim, and which is accepted by the town;¹⁹ or a vote of a town instructing its selectmen to pay a certain alleged claim,²⁰ are not offers in the technical sense.

create legal relations on acceptance. It must not be an offer intended merely to open negotiations which will ultimately result in a contract, or intended to call forth an offer in legal form from the party to whom it is addressed.¹ The commonest examples of offers meant to open negotiations and to call forth offers in the technical sense, are the advertisements, circulars and trade letters sent out by business houses. While it is possible that the offers made by such means may be in such form as to become contracts, they are often merely expressions of a willingness to negotiate.²

The nature of the offer from this point of view is a question of construction of the terms of the offer, as explained by admissible evidence. The following examples serve to illustrate offers which are not intended to create legal relations on acceptance. Where A wrote to B "We are authorized to offer Michigan fine salt in full carload lots of eighty to ninety-five barrels," B telegraphed "Your letter of yesterday received and noted. You may ship me two thousand barrels of Michigan fine salt as offered in your letter;"³ or A wrote asking if certain realty was for sale and if so "telegraph lowest cash price;" B's reply quoted a price; A replied agreeing to buy at that price;⁴ no offer has been made in either case and hence the attempted acceptance does not make a contract. So a table of rates sent in answer to a general inquiry, subject to change at short notice, cannot be accepted so as to make a contract.⁵ An advertisement that a certain train carried "free reclining chair cars" has been held not to be an offer which could be accepted by taking transportation on such train, unless the passenger can further show that he was misled or suffered loss.⁶ So a statement admitting a contingent liability, supposed by the writer to exist already, is not an offer to discharge such liability.⁷ So an advertisement or request for bids is not an offer to be accepted by the successful bidder, but a request for offers from bidders which may be accepted or not, as the party asking for bids chooses.⁸ So the trustees of a fund which was to be devoted to providing a scholarship for the pupil of a certain school who should pass the best examination in certain subjects, do not make an offer, by merely announcing an examination without offering to award the scholarship to the pupil passing with the highest grades at such examination.⁹

If the offer made by means of advertisements, circulars and the like shows an intent to assume legal liability thereby, such offer may on acceptance form a contract.¹⁰ An offer may be made in the catalogue of state university,¹¹ or of a private school;¹² by advertisement in a newspaper;¹³ in an official pamphlet of specifications issued by the United States government;¹⁴ or by a circular offering a reward;¹⁵ in form so definite that acceptance may convert it into agreement. Thus an advertisement of a competition for designs for a building, competing architects to receive $500 each, and the successful architect to be engaged as architect, and superintendent of the building,¹⁶ and an advertisement that a certain sum would be paid to any person who was not cured of influenza after certain treatment with a prescribed remedy;¹⁷ each constitute offers. Time schedules,¹⁸ or freight schedules,¹⁹ may be such offers, if so worded as to show a definite intention to assume liability.

§27. Terms must be complete.

Fourth. The offer, even if intended to create legal relations, must be so complete that upon acceptance, an agreement is formed which contains all the terms necessary to determine whether the contract has been performed or not.¹ An offer in which the price is not fixed, and yet is so specified that it is evident that the parties did not intend merely whatever should be a reasonable compensation,² is not definite enough. is fixed, a clause providing that if the vendee finds that the price agreed upon does not give him a fair margin of profit on a resale he may offer another proposition, does not make the contract indefinite, as such a proposition is not binding on the vendor, and hence does not defeat the other clauses of the contract.³ An offer which leaves the amount of compensation to be determined by subsequent negotiation, fixing only the extreme limits within which the negotiations are to range;⁴ or one which leaves to a future valuation between the parties the price to be paid for realty,⁵ or personalty;⁶ or one which leaves the quantity of material to be furnished,⁷ or the character of buildings to be erected,⁸ or the terms of payment and security for the purchase price,⁹ to be determined by future negotiation, is not complete. the offer is sufficiently complete.¹³ So a contract to furnish gas is not indefinite as not fixing the time during which gas is to be furnished, where the law requires a gas company to supply gas as long as required by the occupant of any building if he pays for it.¹⁴ So where the context shows that prompt performance is intended, the contract is sufficiently definite though no time is expressly fixed.¹⁵ So an offer to buy "four notes of three hundred dollars each" is sufficiently definite though no price is fixed, as the face value of the notes is intended.¹⁶

If the compensation is not fixed by the terms of the contract or by fair construction therefrom, the contract may nevertheless be enforced if a reasonable compensation was intended.¹⁷ Thus services rendered at the express request of the party for whom they are rendered,¹⁸ as by an attorney,¹⁹ or one who aids in the preparation of a case for trial,²⁰ or an agent,²¹ or a physician,²² must be paid for by such party requesting such services although no price has been agreed upon. In such cases a reasonable compensation is allowed. So a promise that one shall be "well paid" if he will delay collecting a debt until the death of the debtor,²³ or if he will sell realty for the promisor,²⁴ is sufficiently definite.

So if no time is fixed for performance²⁵ or for commencing work²⁶ a reasonable time is intended. So if a contract of guaranty does not limit the time or length of credit to be given, a reasonable time is intended.²⁷ If a contract of sale makes no provision for the time of payment the implication is that payment on delivery is intended.²⁸ Contracts of this sort are really part express and part implied.

An offer leaving certain matters to the determination of one party or the other, and not to some subsequent agreement is definite enough. So where the offer fixes the time of commencing work within certain limits and leaves the exact time to the adversary party's choice,²⁹ or reserves the choice to the promisor³⁰ it is sufficiently certain; and so is an offer to buy all the coal used for certain years at a price established for certain grades, though the purchaser has the right to select the grades to be furnished.³¹

An offer referring to a previous contract for the price is complete though the price is omitted from such offer.³² So a contract may be definite although certain terms are omitted, if a contract to be made thereafter between one of the parties and a third party is adopted in advance to supply such terms; such as a building contract³³ or an insurance contract,³⁴ or a contract to pay certain attorneys as much as either of two other attorneys receives for his services in the case.³⁵ So an offer of itself indefinite, as an offer to donate four acres, may be made definite by locating the tract by mutual agreement.³⁷ If the contract, while not specifically determining the subject-matter, fixes the method of determining it thereafter, as in a contract for the sale of realty³⁸ it is certain enough.

Fifth. The offer must not merely be complete in terms, but the terms must be sufficiently definite to enable the court to determine ultimately whether the contract has been performed or not.¹ If no breach of the contract could be assigned which could be measured by any test of damages from the contract it has been said to be too indefinite to be enforceable,² and this vice is usually due to the form of the offer.

An offer to operate a mine "as long as they could make it pay";³ a contract to be terminated on sixty days' notice "for good cause";⁴ a license to cut timber for five years to begin when the buyer begins to manufacture the trees into lumber;⁵ and a promise to extend the time of payment until a certain bank shall resume payment;⁶ are not sufficiently definite. But if the time of performance is one which is bound to happen at some time in the future, such contract is certain even though the time cannot be fixed in advance. Thus a promise by A to marry B when A's wife, already divorced, shall die, is certain.⁷ An offer to allow "part" of the wages of an employee to be applied on a debt of his father's to his employer;⁸ an offer to furnish part of the money necessary to pay for a building,⁹ or one to teach school for "good wages";¹⁰ an offer that if the grain market shall advance enough to justify it, payee shall pay one of two notes for different amounts given him to hold till paid in grain;¹¹ an offer to pay a further sum on a horse, "If he did well and had no bad luck with the horse,"¹² are each too indefinite.

So a promise to pay "the average price paid by other cities" for water;¹³ a contract to build a first-class hotel for the traveling public and to keep it up in a first-class manner on consideration that a railroad would support the hotel by the patronage of its road;¹⁴ a covenant in a deed to "live in harmony with the grantor" and not "make him any more trouble about the sum of money she let him have some forty years ago";¹⁵ and a promise to satisfy one of the heirs, who were agreed on a division of the inherited property, if he should become dissatisfied;¹⁶ are each too indefinite to serve as a basis for a contract. So a by-law of a land association empowering it "to regulate other proceedings" is too vague.¹⁷

The following are other examples of indefinite offers: an agreement that a wholesale dealer in oil shall furnish oil to a retailer on terms so favorable that he can compete with other parties in the same territory;¹⁸ a statement by one who had contracted to manufacture certain articles, that he wished the other party to help him out on his pay-roll, or that he would have to be taken care of or he never would complete the order, even if assented to;¹⁹ a letter stating that A would want a certain amount of glass during the year, maybe more; if less, he would take the amount later, and B's answer that the order was entered and he hoped there would be no trouble in giving them all they wanted;²⁰ a promise not to practice medicine in "the territory surrounding" a specified town;²¹ a promise by a physician to locate elsewhere if he does not get a certain appointment "or the field is not larger then than now,"²² and an offer by first mortgage bondholders to second mortgage bondholders pending reorganization, that the second mortgage bondholders should take part in such reorganization and rank as before.²³ However, a contract to cease the practice of medicine within a certain territory unless some unforeseen necessity should compel him to return has been held sufficiently definite.²⁴ So offers by one who is known not to own property offered, showing merely his belief that he can effect a transfer of it, are not definite enough.²⁵

An indefinite use of certain terms may invalidate an offer; as an ambiguous use of the term "freight allowance";²⁶ or an offer of "all the colored noils for the year 1887"; it not appearing whether it meant all made by the vendor or all used by the purchaser.²⁷ However, an offer "for all steel bow sockets for 1888," accepted "subject to all unavoidable or unforeseen causes" was held definite enough,²⁸ and so was a promise to sell one of each size and style of certain patterns, produced by the manufacturer thereof during the next two years.²⁹

If from the contract the court can determine the terms and conditions thereof and can determine the measure of damages in case of breach, the contract is sufficiently definite.³⁰ The surrounding facts may be looked to to determine whether the offer is sufficiently definite.³¹ Thus offers to pay one-third of the moneys received from all the privileges on fair grounds;³² an offer to sell goods, to be resold for cash, the money thus received, less certain specified expenses, to be turned over to the original vendor, out of which money the goods bought are to the person to whom it is to be made.¹ This rule is unquestioned in contracts where alleged acceptance of an uncommunicated offer is invoked to impose a liability upon the party accepting. Thus the unexpressed and uncommunicated intention of one who claims to act for himself on the one part and for a corporation on the other, that the corporation shall pay certain individual debts does not constitute a contract.² So the vote of a corporation has no effect as a contract until communicated to and accepted by the adversary party.³ So a telegram from A giving prices of glass jars "if specifications favorable," being too indefinite an offer to form the basis of a contract⁴ cannot be supplemented by a letter received by B after he had answered A's telegram, so as to constitute a complete contract.⁵ So where A sends a message to a telegraph office, written on plain paper, and the operator pasted it on a printed blank, A is not bound by terms in such blank.⁶ So where a shipper loaded cotton into a car standing on a side track, no agent of the railroad company being advised thereof, no contract existed.⁷ For the purposes of the law, however, an offer is communicated when it is brought to the attention of the adversary party in such a manner that by the use of ordinary intelligence he cannot help knowing its terms. Thus in case of written contracts, one who accepts a written offer which he has a fair opportunity to read, is bound by its terms in the absence of fraud or misrepresentation, even though he has not read them and does not know them;⁸

or if he misapprehends their legal effect;⁹ while on the other hand, a term of a written contract so inserted as not to be brought fairly to the attention of the adversary party does not bind him.¹⁰ So where the alleged offer consists of acts, it is necessary to show that such acts are brought to the knowledge of the adversary party.¹¹

Questions as to the effect of terms of a written contract not actually brought to the attention of the adversary party often arise on railroad tickets, bills of lading, and the like. A complicating feature in contracts of this sort, however, is that the common carrier is often seeking by the terms of the contract in question to avoid his Common Law liability — an attempt which some courts do not encourage.¹ Accordingly it is sometimes held that a contract whereby a common carrier seeks to avoid his Common Law liability is not binding unless such terms are especially called to the attention of the party to be bound thereby.² This rule rests in part upon the reason that tickets are usually bought in haste, and that the oral contract is made before the ticket is handed to passenger; two circumstances which prevent such terms from being a part of the contract.³ Accordingly where a ticket is purchased with full opportunity for examination, such as a steamship ticket, it is presumed that the purchaser knows its contents.⁴ This rule has been applied even if the passenger cannot read.⁵ The same principle applies where a railway ticket is purchased under circumstances which give to the purchaser a full opportunity for examination and the terms thereof are fairly brought to his notice.⁶ So if a warehouse receipt is accepted with the words "at owner's risk" stamped legibly on its face, such provision forms part of the contract.⁷ In some jurisdictions the mere receipt of a bill of lading is not held as a matter of law to show an acceptance of its terms.⁸ "Where a contract limiting the liability of the carrier is contained in a bill of lading which in its entirety constitutes both a receipt and a contract, the onus is on the carrier to show the restrictions of the Common Law liability were assented to by the consignor."⁹ Bills of lading are not usually taken in such haste as tickets and there is greater reason for holding the shipper bound by such terms.

Other courts hold that the party accepting a bill of lading and the like from a common carrier is bound by terms thereon which are fairly placed before him even if not especially called to his attention.¹⁰ Where the view last expressed obtains and terms printed in obscure type on the face of the ticket, or printed on the back, are sought to be incorporated in the contract of transportation, the rules determining liability are as follows:

(1) If the person buying the ticket or bill of lading knows what the terms and conditions thus offered are, he is bound thereby.¹¹ A similar rule applies to bills of lading.¹²

(2) Even if he does not know of the nature of special terms and conditions thus offered, he is nevertheless bound if he is notified in a reasonable manner of their existence and omits to ascertain their nature.¹³

This rule applies whether the passenger signs the ticket,¹⁴ even if in haste,¹⁵ or whether he omits to sign it.¹⁶ The sale of a ticket at a reduced rate is notice of special conditions therein.¹⁷ So that a condition on the face of a ticket, sold at a reduced rate, that it should be stamped before return, is binding even on a purchaser who cannot read and does not know of the condi-

Bills of lading and contracts for the transportation of baggage are subject to the same rules as tickets for transportation of passengers. The shipper is bound by terms on the face of his contract, whether read or not if he has an opportunity to read them.²⁰ If the terms of the contract appear on the face of the bill of lading, the fact that the shipper cannot read does not prevent these terms from binding him, at least if the shipper does not know of such inability.²¹

So a notice as to excursions is not binding unless in the ticket.²³ So while a shipper has as a rule an opportunity for examining the bill of lading furnished to him, he is not bound by the terms thereof where no such opportunity is given and no notice is given thereof.²⁴

What amounts to reasonable notice of terms in tickets and bills of lading is in part a question of fact. The following are cases in which the purchaser was held not to have a reasonable notice of the terms contained in the ticket: Where on the face of the ticket were the words "See back" in conspicuous type, but no reference was made to the conditions on the back as part of the contract nor was the attention of the passenger called to them;²⁵ where a ticket was folded up when delivered to the purchaser, and, while he knows that there is writing thereon, he does not know that such writing is a contract;²⁶ where a ticket was sold whose time-limit had expired but the purchaser was unable to read the terms because of the poor light in the depot;²⁷ or where a receipt for a trunk contained special terms which could not be read in the dimly lighted car where it was delivered.²⁸ Where the terms are in part expressed by punch marks and the like so unintelligible as not to be easily understood by a person of ordinary intelligence, the purchaser will not be bound thereby even if a notice on the face of the ticket recites that a "passenger in accepting this transfer agrees to read and be governed by the conditions on the back thereof"; and on the back appears a condition that the passenger shall examine date, time, and directions of a transfer check, which are so complicated in the form used that they cannot be easily understood by persons of ordinary intelligence.²⁹

So where the clause in question is on the back of the bill of lading and is not brought to the attention of the shipper,³⁰ or where the clause in question is stamped in red ink on one corner of the shipping receipt,³¹ or is in type too small to be read,³² or is covered by a revenue stamp so as to be illegible,³³ he is not bound thereby.

(4) If a passenger makes an oral contract with the railway company, he may assume in the absence of special notice, that the ticket given to him shows the terms of the contract correctly.³⁴ So where an oral agreement for transportation is made, the shipper may assume that a bill of lading subsequently delivered to him sets forth the terms of the oral agreement correctly; and he is not bound by the insertion of different terms therein.³⁵ So a verbal agreement for transportation cannot be varied by the terms of a receipt delivered by the agent of the carrier to the shipper, folded up, which he put in his pocket in ignorance of its contents.³⁶

In general it may be deduced from the cases cited that if the instrument offered by the carrier is understood to be a receipt, a check, or a voucher, the party receiving it is not bound by terms not called to his attention; while if he understands it to be a contract he is bound to use reasonable care to ascertain the terms thereof.

A class of cases similar to these arises where by mistake, misrepresentation, or fraud, A is induced to enter into a written contract which contains terms of which he is not informed. A discussion of A's liability is given under the titles of fraud, misrepresentation and mistake.³⁷ A is usually held not liable if he is free from negligence and has not estopped himself from showing that he did not know the terms of the contract; but if he knew or by reasonable effort might know the contents of the contract he is liable, except in the case of fraud or misrepresentation.

§32. Necessity of communication of offer in rewards.

It is usually so clear that no rights can arise out of acts done without knowledge of or intent to accept an offer, though such acts might be an appropriate means of acceptance if intended for that purpose, that few questions ever arise thereunder. One class of cases is, however, anomalous in its treatment by some courts and has given rise to a conflict of authority on this point. This class consists of cases where a reward has been offered for doing some act and the act has been done in ignorance of the offer. The logical treatment of these cases would be to hold that no acceptance can be made of an uncommunicated offer, and many courts do in fact so hold.¹ Many of these cases are cases where a reward was offered for the arrest of an alleged criminal.²

Other courts moved rather by a feeling that if the person offering the reward receives the benefit of the act, he should make compensation, than by technical legal considerations have treated such acts as a valid acceptance, and have enforced such contracts.³ Many of these cases are cases where a reward was offered for the recovery of property.⁴ In some cases involving arrest, the party who made the arrest recovered the reward even where the arrest was made before the reward was offered.⁵ He has been allowed to recover where he had heard of the reward though he had not seen the formal notice until after the arrest.⁶

The questions of whether any proper acceptance is made where the offer is communicated, but the act is done for a motive other than the reward, and whether any consideration exists are questions discussed later.⁷

§33. Express revocation of offer.

An offer may be withdrawn at any time before it has been accepted, and cannot, after withdrawal, be accepted so as to make a binding contract.¹ An offer may be withdrawn even if negotiations have progressed as long as no acceptance has been made,² or even if money has been paid when the offer was made.³ Thus, an order for goods given to a traveling salesman, accepted subject to acceptance by his employer, can be revoked by the party giving the order at any time before such acceptance,⁴ even if the party making the offer deposited notes as part of the offer, and the principal of the agent accepts after the withdrawal.⁵ So an acceptance by one attorney of an offer by another subject to the approval of the client of such offer may be revoked by the first before approval by the client.⁶ Thus at an auction sale a bid may be withdrawn at any time before it is accepted.⁷ So the party offering the property for sale may withdraw it at any time before a bid has been accepted.⁸ A public officer,⁹ such as a commissioner,¹⁰ or an executor,¹¹ has the same right to withdraw an offer before a bid is accepted unless the authority under which he sells gives him no discretion. So the auctioneer may withdraw all articles from sale without any liability to prospective bidders.¹² In the United States an agreement in advance, without valuable consideration, that bids should not be withdrawn does not destroy the right to withdraw bids.¹³ In England it has been held that under an announcement of a sale "without reserve," the highest bid must be accepted.¹⁴

An offer may be withdrawn before acceptance by acts of the offerer, inconsistent with the continued existence of the offer, and brought to the knowledge of the offeree.¹ A common example of such revocation is found in offers of sale, where the offerer sells the property in question to another person before the offer is accepted, and the offeree learns of such sale before acceptance.² Thus A offered to B to sell a mortgage for less than the amount due. Before definite acceptance A notified B that he had sold the mortgage to a third person. This was equivalent to a withdrawal of the offer.³

§35. What offers are irrevocable.

An offer may be withdrawn at any time before acceptance, even though it was originally made to remain open for a fixed time, if not upon valuable consideration or under seal.¹

If the promise not to withdraw the offer for the time specified is upon valuable consideration, the offerer has not the right to withdraw such offer during the time specified.² Thus if the offerer agrees to keep his offer open for two days on consideration that the offeree will pay the attorney's fees and expenses of the offerer if the offer is not accepted, the offerer cannot revoke such offer during such time.³ While the offerer has no right to withdraw such an offer, he not infrequently attempts to do so: and an important question arises as to the effect upon the offer of the attempted revocation. Is the attempted revocation a nullity, leaving the original offer open, so that acceptance within the time limited will make it a contract; or does it revoke the offer, leaving the offerer liable for breach of his contract not to revoke the offer? Many of the cases which declare that an offer to be open for a fixed time on a valuable consideration is irrevocable do so in obiters, as in such cases the offer was either accepted before revocation,⁴ or was not accepted until after the offer had lapsed by efflux of time.⁵ Of the cases in which an attempted revocation was made before the expiration of the time fixed by the offer, many are cases in which specific performance would have been given had the offer been accepted before revocation. In cases of this sort if the offer is to remain open a fixed time and is on valuable consideration, equity ignores the attempted revocation, and treats a subsequent acceptance exactly as if no attempted revocation had been made; that is, unless the rights of third persons have intervened, it gives specific performance wherever that remedy would have been given had such attempted revocation not been made.⁶ At law a right of action on the contract made by the original offer as accepted has been recognized.⁷ The difference between the two theories is often of no practical importance at law since the same evidence would be admitted and the same measure of value adopted under one as under the other.

Some courts hold that an offer under seal to remain open for a certain time is irrevocable;⁸ others, that it is revocable.⁹ This conflict of authority, like the rule itself, depends in part on the view of the effect of the seal entertained in that jurisdiction.

The result of holding such offer irrevocable is spoken of as

"anomalous."¹⁰ *Xenos v. Wickham*¹¹ is cited as an authority for this proposition wherever it is advanced, and the language of some of the judges forming a majority of the court certainly recognizes the doctrine. The case itself, however, presents no features of a remarkable character. An insurance policy was contracted for, issued on credit, and placed in the hands of an agent of the insurer indeed; but absolutely within the control of the insured, to be handed to him when he asked for it. Accordingly the policy was held to be delivered and in full force and effect. This is in accordance with the holding of American courts.¹² Subsequently the broker, who had effected the insured, ordered the policy cancelled, without authority from the insured. Thereafter the vessel insured was lost; and it was held that as the policy was delivered and had never been cancelled by authority, the insurers were liable for the loss. The difficulty of the case consists in the fact that some of the judges rested their concurrence on the fact that a sealed offer could not be revoked, and the correctness of this view is generally the point on which the case is either criticised as an anomaly or defended as an example of the peculiar effect of the sealed offer.

A revocation to be effectual must be communicated to the offeree before acceptance.¹ Thus a revocation sent by mail or telegraph is ineffectual until received by the offeree.² An exception to this rule is found in offers by advertisement, which may be revoked in the same way in which they are made.³ It seems that it is not necessary that express notice of revocation effected by acts should be given by the offerer, if the offeree learns it from other sources.⁴ This doctrine does not probably apply to revocation by express words.

An offer, when once rejected loses its legal force and cannot be accepted thereafter so as to create a binding agreement,¹ unless it is renewed after the rejection by the original offerer. No revocation of the offer is therefore necessary to prevent its subsequent acceptance after it has once been rejected.

§38. Lapse of offer by expiration of time.—Time not fixed by offer.

An offer once made is not to be regarded as open for acceptance indefinitely. The rules on this subject may be grouped under two general classes.

(1) If no time for acceptance is fixed by the terms of the offer, an acceptance if made within a reasonable time and before revocation completes the contract;¹ but a delay in acceptance beyond a reasonable time causes the offer to lapse, and a subsequent attempt to accept is of no legal effect.² No formal withdrawal of the offer is necessary if it remains unaccepted after a reasonable time.³ Thus if a contract is to take effect on A's approval, A must give notice of his approval in a reasonable time to make the contract valid.⁴

Where the offer is to do an act in the future, it may be accepted a reasonable time after it is made,⁵ and possibly within a reasonable time from the time fixed for doing such act. Thus an offer to buy a foal if it was "a filly, all right and sound at five months old" may be accepted within a reasonable time after it is five months old;⁶ and an offer made in 1884 to take stock at its cost price "any time after Jan. 1, 1886, if at that time you desire to have me do so," must be accepted in at least a reasonable time after January 1, 1886.⁷

It is impossible to lay down a rule for determining what is a reasonable time in every case. Delays of twenty years,⁸ twelve years,⁹ four years,¹⁰ six months,¹¹ and one month,¹² have been held unreasonable. It was, on the other hand, held reasonable where the offer to sell land was accepted in seventeen days; a note and defective mortgage were tendered in six days more, and a valid mortgage in twenty-one days more.¹³

An application of this rule, rather than an exception to it, exists where the circumstances indicate that acceptance must be made at once if at all;¹⁴ as where the parties are in personal communication.¹⁵ Thus where the market was ready to open, and letters between the parties had always been answered in three days, a delay of six days was held unreasonable.¹⁶

§39. Time fixed by offer.

(2) If a time is fixed by the terms of the offer, within which acceptance can be made, the party to whom the offer is made may accept at any time within the limit thus fixed, the offer not being withdrawn, even if the delay would be held unreasonable but for the terms of the offer.¹ So acceptance was held valid where A offered to C to discount B's bills without recourse after a certain date, and C answered that he would let A know before such date whether he would accept A's offer; and five days before such date C notified A that he accepted, and thereupon C discounted B's bills, though in the meantime B had failed.²

On the other hand an offer lapses by failure to accept within the time limited even if the delay would not ordinarily be deemed unreasonable had no time been limited.³ So a telegram received at 10 p. m. Saturday night to be "instantly" answered cannot be accepted on Monday morning, nothing preventing a reply on Saturday night;⁴ nor can an offer requiring telegraphic acceptance on receipt, be accepted on the following day.⁵ So if acceptance is to be by return mail, a subsequent acceptance has no validity;⁶ and an offer to sell, if to be accepted by telegram on receipt of the letter, cannot be accepted after two days.⁷ If the last day fixed by the offer is a holiday, but the statute does not provide for a suspension of business on that day, an acceptance on the day following is too late.⁸ A subsequent request for time to consider a subsequent demand for performance and an offer of compromise does not amount to a renewal of the offer.⁹

§40. Lapse of offer by death or insanity of offerer.

The death of the offerer before acceptance effects a revocation of the offer;¹ and so does his insanity.² So a guaranty of future obligations which is in the nature of a continuing offer is revoked by the death of the guarantor as to liabilities incurred thereafter.³ However if the offer is, for a valuable consideration, to remain open for a certain time, the offerer cannot revoke it,⁴ and so it has been held that his death does not cause it to lapse.⁵ On the other hand it has been held that the death of the offeree causes such an offer to lapse; and that his heirs or personal representatives cannot accept it.⁶ These two views are not necessarily irreconcilable. Though the death of one party does not necessarily cause such an offer to lapse, the offerer contracts for the credit and ability of the offeree to perform as an essential feature of the contract; and so an offer made to him cannot in case of his death be accepted by any one else.

§41. Necessity and effect of acceptance.

Until acceptance the offer is not an agreement between the parties.¹ Such offer has no legal effect for two reasons: acceptance is necessary to form an agreement, and without acceptance no consideration exists.² So if A offers to convey certain property to B if B, in return, will agree to do certain things, no rights either in such property or against A personally can come into existence until B accepts such offer.³ So an order for goods is of no legal effect until accepted.⁴ Upon acceptance the offer becomes an agreement, enforceable if otherwise valid;⁵ which cannot be withdrawn thereafter by the offerer.⁶ Thus if a contract for lighting streets is contained in a city ordinance, it cannot after acceptance, be ended by repealing the ordinance.⁷ New terms cannot be inserted after acceptance without the consent of both parties.⁸ Thus an attorney who offered to try a case for a school board for a certain sum cannot after informal acceptance and after the trial of the case withdraw his offer and recover a larger sum on the ground that he had no binding contract with the board.⁹

The contract dates from the acceptance, and does not relate back to the date of the original offer. Hence if improvements on realty have been destroyed between the dates of offer and acceptance the offeree cannot have a decree for specific performance with the improvements restored, nor can he have an abatement from the price offered.¹⁰ The elements of acceptance must therefore be considered in detail.

§42. Elements of acceptance.—Intention to accept.

An intention to accept the terms of the offer as valid is ordinarily an essential element of a valid acceptance. Hence failure or omission to reject an offer is not the equivalent of an acceptance.¹ Thus a statement by a son, one of several children, to his mother in answer to her request that he would return to her farm to live, that he would not go back to it again to repair it for people who had not done any work on it, followed by his return, does not show acceptance of his offer to manage the farm and support her for life if she would leave him the farm in severalty at her death.² So where A made an offer to B, which B did not reject because he was too weak and sick to talk, such failure to reject is not an acceptance.³ Even if the party making the offer prescribes that a failure to answer shall be regarded as an acceptance, such failure does not amount to an acceptance.⁴

The party to whom the offer is made may, however, have agreed that his silence shall be equivalent to an acceptance; and this agreement may be understood from the conduct of the parties. In such a case, retaining a letter applying for shares is an acceptance.⁵

The exceptions to the rule that intention to accept is an essential element of acceptance are found in jurisdictions where acts done without knowledge of a reward are considered as an acceptance of an offer of a reward for the doing of such acts.⁶

§43. Necessity of communication of acceptance.

A mere mental intention to accept, not followed by such act or notice as is sufficient in law to charge the party making the offer with notice of the acceptance, does not have any legal effect in converting the offer into a contract.¹

An offer to a corporation is not accepted by the corporation's adoption of a resolution to accept the offer, of which resolution no notice is given.² But where A signed an application for a mortgage and the finance committee who had power to make the loan approved it, such acceptance was held sufficient.³ A made a proposition to a corporation through its committee for the termination of a lease. The committee recommended the acceptance of this proposition: and the corporation accepted the report of the committee. No communication of this was made to A by authority of the corporation. It was held that no contract was made.⁴ A vote by the officers of a corporation or municipality to accept a certain bid, is not of itself an acceptance of such bid, so as to create a contract between the bidder and the corporation.⁵ So no contract was made where the plans of all the architects submitted were rejected. A, one of the architects, was by vote of the board chosen as architect. This vote was reconsidered and rescinded before A was notified by the board, though he learned it from some members; or before A accepted.⁶ So an offer by a wife that she and her husband would pay his stepdaughter, her daughter, for services in the family, made in his presence, does not bind unless the husband knew that the daughter continued her services in reliance on the promise.⁷ So where A offered to join in buying future cotton, but was not notified of acceptance till the transaction was completed, at a loss, there was no contract.⁸ So where A offered to allow B to use part of A's realty for a party wall, and B did not accept this offer, but built the wall, two years later, without A's knowledge, no contract existed.⁹ Upon the question of whether knowledge of acceptance acquired from some person other than the offeree or his agent is sufficient, a distinction must be made. If the acceptance is to be made expressly, by words, a communication by the offeree to a stranger is not an acceptance, even if the offerer should learn of it.¹⁰ If the acceptance is to be made by acts, according to the weight of authority, if knowledge of the acceptance is actually brought to the offerer, it makes no difference that it was not brought by the offeree or his agent.¹¹ Thus if a guaranty can be accepted by extending credit to the party guaranteed, knowledge of the extension of credit, no matter how acquired is notice to the guarantor of the acceptance of his offer.¹²

The intention to accept must be expressed in positive terms.¹ Thus a statement by the offeree that he would think over the matter,² or that he would like to accept,³ or a promise to "take up the matter" at a later time,⁴ or that he would see what he could do and give notice later⁵ are none of them equivalent to an acceptance. So where A asked for prices on five cars of corn and B replied quoting different prices on two varieties and A ordered five cars, not indicating which variety, no contract was made.⁶

§45. Acceptance must correspond to offer.

The acceptance must, furthermore, correspond to the offer

§46. Acceptance purporting to modify offer.

An attempted acceptance which seeks to modify one or more terms of the offer is of no legal effect as an acceptance. It is really a rejection of the offer, and a counter-proposition in lieu of the original offer, and must be accepted by the party making the original offer in order to constitute an agreement.¹ Thus an attempted acceptance of an offer to sell land, adding a term to the effect that the title is to be good² or is to be approved by the vendee's representative³ is ineffectual. So where the offer is to sell land "as the title now stands. If the offer of sale does not state the terms of payment, cash payment is implied. Hence an acceptance which attempts to secure even a short period of credit does not make a contract.¹⁷ So an acceptance which attempts to modify the price,¹⁸ as by asking a rebate for damages previously caused by fire,¹⁹ which attempts to modify the quantity offered for sale,²⁰ or the quality of goods offered,²¹ or the time for which the contract is to run,²² or adding a clause as to the disposition of the cases in which the eggs purchased were to be shipped²³ is invalid. there were two maps of the property at Merced under consideration, a town plat and a map of a larger tract with the town marked off, and offer for the "balance of Merced town property" was not accepted by a reply agreeing to sell the "Merced property," though referred to as the property for which the offer was made.²⁴ So acceptance of an offer to sell lumber at fixed price is not made by an indorsement on the 18th, "I accept the above price as quoted on Ashland dock. Will wire acceptance on balance contract on 20th," where the offer gave the purchaser a choice between paying cash and giving paper due in 90 days.²⁵ So where A asked B for the cost of a certain number each of certain sizes of rhododendrons and B gave the price for all but one size and suggested a cable code for ordering such sizes as he had, and A cabled, "Ship as ordered," no contract existed, as A was ordering one size on which B had declined to quote a price.²⁶ However, where A sent B a letter offering to sell two cars at a fixed rate, B's telegram "accept your offer, two cars . . . as per letter," is an unconditional acceptance, the 'letter' referring to A's letter to B, and not to one to be sent to A from B and hence adds no new term.²⁷

On the same principle if a written offer is made and before acceptance by the offeree it is modified by a third party, without the consent of the offerer, and it is then accepted by the offeree, no valid contract exists.²⁸

An acceptance may state with emphasis certain terms which are contained in the offer by construction or by implication of the law. If the terms thus insisted on in the acceptance are the same as those of the offer, an agreement is thereby created.²⁹ Thus an offer to sell, "terms of sale cash" and an acceptance providing that bills for goods delivered shall be paid daily make a contract;³⁰ and so where the offer provides that the work shall be done in a certain time and the acceptance adds that time is of the essence of the contract;³¹ or where the offer is to sell land at $3,500; and the acceptance is, "I will pay the $3,500 cash. Send you hereby $500 and pay balance on delivery of warranty deed,"³² or where an acceptance of an offer to sell flour adds "If the sacks are branded must be resacked in plain sacks,"³³ or where an ordinance provided that the contractor should accept assessments on abutting property except as to intersections and improvements in front of the city and other property not subject to assessment and the bid accepted the offer provided the city would guarantee the certificate of assessment as to certain specified property, which belonged to the state.³⁴ So an offer to buy bonds, to run 30 years is governed by statute making them redeemable in 5 years; and hence acceptance by city is binding.³⁵

An acceptance may refer to new terms not as part of the contract but as favors asked of the party offering to be granted or withheld at his option. Such new terms do not of course invalidate the acceptance.³⁶ Thus an answer to a request for insurance for a certain amount that the amount seemed too much but that the insurance could stand till Monday, when the insurers would be glad to see the insurer, was an acceptance of the proposal to insure for the full amount for the time indicated.³⁷ An inquiry as to whether the offerer will modify the terms of the offer is not a rejection.³⁸

If after acceptance the acceptor insists on a modification of the original contract in which the offerer does not acquiesce, such insistence cannot avoid the contract. Hence the acceptor can subsequently enforce the original contract in the absence of facts to create an estoppel.³⁹

§47. Conditional or modified acceptance treated as rejection and counter offer.

A conditional acceptance of an offer does not constitute an agreement unless the condition is complied with.¹ Among examples of conditional acceptances which do not create a contract are the following: an acceptance of an offer to obtain land at execution sale, conditioned on the offerer's giving an obligation that the land would not cost over a certain sum;² an acceptance of a request to borrow money on real estate security, which was never given,³ an acceptance conditioned on giving certain security, which was never given,⁴ or of transmitting certain information to the party accepting;⁵ or of furnishing the written legal opinion of the city attorney that the bonds offered for sale were legal;⁶ an acceptance conditioned on the assent of a third person, which is never given;⁷ a letter stating that the writer's acceptance when confirmed by a certificate of agency from the sendee is an agreement of agency, the letter not being assented to and the certificate not signed;⁸ an acceptance conditioned on payment to acceptor of insurance received by adversary party for loss of a building on the land contracted for, which was refused.⁹

Since the acceptance with an attempted modification is at least a counter proposal, it may be accepted by the original offerer, and thus may constitute a contract.¹⁰ Thus a valid agreement is produced by A's offer to B's agent to sell subject to B's approval, B's approval subject to new conditions, and A's acceptance of such new conditions;¹¹ and so where the offer was to take a thirty day acceptance of a draft, and a note was offered and accepted.¹²

§48. Prescribed form of acceptance.

The party making the offer may prescribe a mode in which acceptance must be made, if at all. Two results follow in such cases.

(1) Unless the party making the offer subsequently modifies his requirements, expressly or impliedly, he cannot be bound by an acceptance in any other form.¹ Thus A made B an offer by messenger, acceptance to be delivered to the messenger. The messenger said that he was not sure that he would return to A; and B, with good cause, thought that an acceptance by letter would reach A sooner and more certainly than an acceptance by messenger. The messenger returned to A before the letter reached him. It was held that A was justified in treating his offer as having lapsed, as soon as the messenger returned without an acceptance.² Thus where the offer requires an acceptance to be made in writing, no other form of acceptance can be made.³ Where the proposal required acceptance "by wire or otherwise," it could be accepted by telegram or personal verbal acceptance.⁴ So an offer to be effective upon certain conditions can be accepted only by performing such conditions.⁵ So an option to be accepted by paying a certain sum of money cannot be accepted by words only.⁶ An offer which provides for acceptance by making a specified payment by a specified time cannot be accepted unless such payment is made.⁷ So offers as of rewards for doing certain acts can be accepted only by doing such acts, an oral acceptance of such offer without doing such act being of no effect in law;⁸ though considered as a counter-offer, it might be accepted in turn. So offers of subscriptions in consideration of incurring certain obligations can be accepted only by incurring such obligations.⁹ (2) In case the party to whom the offer is made has done all that is prescribed in the offer as requisite for an acceptance, the offer is accepted whether the party offering has actual knowledge of the acceptance or not. Examples of this last rule may be found in those cases where the understanding of the parties is that acceptance may be made by mail or telegraph, and where, accordingly, acceptance is completed when delivered to the post or the telegraph for transmission.¹⁰

¹⁰ See § 52.

Other examples may be found in the cases where a reward is offered for the doing of an act, and acceptance consists in doing such act; preliminary notice to the party offering being unnecessary.¹¹ An illustration of this principle is found in some forms of guaranty. If A offers to B to guarantee C's debt to B, he may so word his offer that the only acceptance necessary is B extending credit, forbearing suit, or whatever else may be the consideration of the guaranty stipulated. In absolute guaranties, this form of acceptance is usually held to be all that is necessary to bind the guarantor unless he stipulates express for notice of acceptance.¹² Thus an absolute guaranty may be binding without notice though an accompanying agreement to buy stock is invalid for want of acceptance.¹³

Such notice of acceptance may be unnecessary even where the parties are in personal communication when the offer is made. Thus notice of acceptance was held unnecessary where A offered to give five thousand dollars to any person who would bring the body of A's wife, dead or alive, from a burning building and B without giving notice of acceptance entered such building and brought the dead body of A's wife therefrom.¹⁴ So subscriptions as to educational and charitable objects can ordinarily be accepted only by performing the conditions stipulated in the offer; but the performance of such conditions within a proper time is a sufficient acceptance, even if not specifically brought to the notice of the offerer.¹⁵

The party prescribing a form of acceptance may waive such form, and accept as binding any other method of acceptance. Such waiver occurs where an acceptance not made in the prescribed form is communicated to the offerer and is received by him without objection.¹⁶

Where the party prescribing the mode of acceptance voluntarily makes it impossible for the adversary party to accept in the prescribed mode, he is held to waive such form. Thus where A offered to B to sell cattle, the offer to be accepted by B at an appointed interview on the following day, if at all, and B was present at the appointed time and place, but A was absent, it was held that B might accept by sending for the cattle the next day.¹⁷ Where a written formal acceptance of rights and benefits under a statute was required, allowing a railroad company to act thereunder and to exercise such rights waives such requirements.¹⁸

Where the offer does not prescribe any specific manner of acceptance any form of communicating intention to accept the offer, made to the party making the offer or to some one duly authorized to represent him is sufficient, and converts the offer into a promise or agreement.¹

Among the forms of acceptance held proper are the following: replying to an offer of a position as teacher, "Yes, I guess I will take the school";² an acknowledgment of the receipt of

Thus no contract was held to exist where A who was looking up lands of B, clearing title, etc., wrote to B proposing that he should receive one-half lands and pay his own expenses or one-third lands and expenses clear; and B answered "go ahead and get all our lands clear, and, after all entanglements are removed, satisfactory arrangements will be made. Perhaps your ideas are not too high."¹⁰

§50. Acceptance implied from acts.

The party accepting an offer may as well signify his assent to an offer by doing acts which clearly and unequivocally show such assent, as by express words. If such acts are done with the knowledge of the party making the offer, they amount to an acceptance thereof.¹ Thus where an order for goods has been sent, a shipment of such goods, within proper time for an acceptance, is an acceptance of such order,² and accepting goods is an acceptance of the offer under which such goods are sent.³ So an offer for the erection of a water-works,⁴ a railroad,⁵ or

So an offer to do some specified act if the other party will forbear suit for a certain time may be accepted by forbearing suit for such time in reliance on such promise, where the circumstances bring such form of acceptance to the knowledge of the party making the offer.⁷ So if A offers to B to guarantee C's debt to B if B will forbear suit, B's forbearance in reliance thereon if known to A is a sufficient acceptance.⁸ This reason has been expressly given for contracts of guaranty.⁹ Another reason given for this rule is that the guarantor should learn from his principal "with whom he is supposed to be on intimate terms" whether his guaranty is accepted.¹⁰ So an offer by a mortgagor to one who has assumed the mortgage on purchasing the mortgaged property, to release him personally and look solely to the property for payment may be accepted by conduct in refraining from any attempt to have such property applied on such debt.¹¹ So entering a school or college in reliance upon the terms of the catalogue is an acceptance of the offer there made.¹² But if such acts are not brought to the knowledge of the party making the offer they do not amount to an acceptance.¹³ So a written contract signed by one party may be accepted by the other party by assenting to it and acting upon it, even if he does not sign it.¹⁴ So if A makes a promise to B for C, C's suing on such contract is an acceptance thereof.¹⁵ If C is a minor and the contract is for his benefit, his acceptance may be presumed.¹⁶ So where the correspondence shows that both parties assumed that they had thereby entered into a binding contract, the fact that no express acceptance of the offer is made does not prevent agreement from existing.¹⁷

An offer is usually made to some definite person. In such case only such person can accept the offer, and acceptance by another has no legal effect.¹ Thus an offer by A to B to guarantee X's debt to B, cannot be accepted by C so as to create liability against A,² as where an offer of guaranty, made to a firm is accepted by one partner who continues in business after dissolution of the firm.³ Such attempted acceptance may of course amount to a new proposition from such third person, which may in turn be accepted by the original offerer.

It is possible for an offer to be made, not to any specific person, identified as the offeree when the offer is made, but to any person, then indefinite, who shall later be ascertained. Such offers are valid.⁴ A common type of such offers is the offer of a reward for the doing of some specified act. The doing of the act serves the triple purpose of consideration, acceptance, and identification of the offeree.⁵ So an offer of a subscription for a certain purpose, not made to any specified person may be accepted by the person for whose benefit it was made.⁶

In some cases an offer may be made to a person not in existence, which offer if still outstanding may be accepted by such person after coming into existence. Thus an offer to a corporation, made before it is formed, may be accepted by it afterwards.⁷ So a corporation may become liable for services of a promoter by accepting the benefit of them after it is incorporated.⁸

until "delivery" takes effect when it is mailed to the insured, properly addressed, postage prepaid.² The chief classes of cases in which this question becomes important are as follows: (1) Where the letter is lost, and the question arises as to whether the party offering is bound, the weight of authority is that he is bound though he had no actual knowledge of the acceptance, if a letter was a proper means of communication.³ (2) If the party making the offer attempts to revoke the offer by sending a later letter or telegram, such attempted revocation is of no effect.⁴ Thus an offer was made by telegraph, subject to "prompt reply." It was accepted by telegraph twelve minutes after receipt, which telegram was not delivered for an hour. After the telegram of acceptance was sent and before it was delivered, a telegram was sent revoking the offer. The contract was held to be binding.⁵ So, on the same principle the party who has accepted cannot, by a subsequent communication, modify the terms of the agreement thus made.⁶ (3) If the party making the offer dies before the letter of acceptance is received, but after it is mailed, the offer does not lapse, since it has already been turned into an agreement by acceptance.⁷ The rule is the same where the party accepting the offer dies after his letter of acceptance is mailed.⁸

Some authorities have held that the date of the receipt of the letter fixed the moment of acceptance.⁹ The English Law has been settled in accordance with the rule in the text;¹⁰ and the later Massachusetts cases have ignored the earlier Massachusetts rule and laid down the same rule as that already indicated.¹¹

In any event the contract is of course complete on receipt of the telegram,¹² or letter.¹³

Under what circumstances the mail or telegraph is a proper means of communication is a question on which the courts have expressed different opinions in assigning reasons for their decisions; though the actual conflict in decisions has been slight.

"The offer must be made before the acceptance, and it does not matter whether it is made a longer or a shorter time before, if by its express or implied terms it is outstanding at the time of its acceptance. Whether much or little time has intervened, it reaches forward to the moment of the acceptance, and speaks then. It would be monstrous to allow an inconsistent act of the offerer, not known or brought to the notice of the offeree, to affect the making of the contract; for instance a sale by an agent elsewhere one minute after the principal personally has offered goods which are accepted within five minutes by the person to whom he is speaking. The principle is the same when the time is longer and the act relied on a step looking to but not giving notice. The contrary suggestion by Wilde, J., in McCulloch v. Eagle Ins. Co., 1 Pick. (Mass.) 278, 279, is not adopted as a ground of decision, and the view which we take is that taken by the Supreme Court of the United States, and is now the settled law of England." *Brauer v. In many of the cases, the original offer was made by mail or telegraph and considerable stress was laid on that fact as indicating that such means of acceptance was proper, the mail being said to be the offerer's agent to deliver the offer and receive the acceptance.¹⁴ The courts have been inclined to extend the propriety of accepting by letter or telegraph to cases where the party making the offer contemplated a final acceptance or refusal at a time when the parties were not in personal communication.¹⁵ A recent English case has gone so far as to hold that an offer made personally may be accepted by mail where time for acceptance was given, and that even in such case, the acceptance dates from mailing.¹⁶ However, where under postal regulations a letter of acceptance is stopped in transitu and returned to the writer it is held that no contract was made by depositing it in the mail.¹⁷

What constitutes a proper sending by mail or telegraph is a question upon which there has been but little discussion. Depositing a letter in the post office is a sufficient mailing if the letter is stamped.¹⁸ On the other hand, if the town postman is not the agent of the post office to receive letters, delivery to him is not mailing, for purpose of determining the acceptance of a letter applying for an allotment of shares.¹⁹ If a letter is delivered to a messenger to mail, acceptance dates from the time the messenger mails it.²⁰ If this is not done until the offer is revoked or lapses, it is of course too late.

If the party making the offer wishes to avoid the application of these rules, he can do so by prescribing that only the receipt of the letter or telegram of acceptance shall constitute a proper acceptance. Thus where A offered by letter, and required a prompt answer by telegraph, and provided that unless he received the answer "yes" by a certain time, he would infer that "no" was intended, no contract is made until an answer is received.²¹ So no contract was created, where A offered to settle a claim for a certain sum if paid in ten days; and B mailed A a check within ten days but it was not received till afterwards.²² So he may prescribe some other method of acceptance, as sending acceptance by the messenger carrying the offer.²³

From the nature of the case no doubt can exist in law as to the time at which a contract is made by telephone. Wherever the question of the place where such a contract is made is material there is opportunity for dispute. It has been held that the place at which such acceptor is when he accepts by telephone is the place where such contract is made.²⁴

The existence of a contract, therefore, often depends on whether a given communication is an offer or an acceptance. Thus, in contracts of guaranty, a written communication by A to B agreeing to guarantee X's debt to B may be an acceptance of a proposition by B to A to lend money to X if A will guarantee it; and in such case A's acceptance completes the contract, and B may hold A on such contract, the other elements of a valid contract being present, without acceptance by B.¹ On the other hand, it may be an offer by A to B to induce B to make the loan to X. In such case, B must accept the offer to hold A. A's loan to X without such acceptance is not sufficient.²

So if A makes an agreement with B's agent, in the form of a contract, but subject to B's approval, this is in legal effect an offer by A to B and may be revoked at any time before B accepts.³ So a contract signed by an agent, which is not to go into effect until approved by his principal in writing has no effect till then.⁴ After B has shipped goods in accordance with A's offer, and has notified A, the contract is complete.⁵

§54. Effect of intending to reduce contract to writing.

In many cases of oral offer and acceptance, the parties intend to reduce the contract to writing, but such reduction is not effected. The validity of the oral agreement in such cases depends on the intention of the parties. If the parties intend the oral agreement to be binding, and the written contract to be merely for convenience as evidence of the exact terms of the oral agreement, such oral agreement is valid; and the same rule applies where the agreement is reached informally by means of letters and telegrams, while a subsequent written contract is

If the guaranty is signed by the guarantor without any previous request of the other party, and in his absence, for no consideration moving between them, except future advances to be made to the principal debtor, the guaranty is, in legal effect, an offer or proposal on the part of the guarantor, needing an accept-contemplated.¹ Thus where an offer contained "if this is agreed to, the contract can be drawn up and signed," it was held that such offer did not call for formal contract, but gave the promisee the option to demand one.² On the same principle a written contract, providing for a general release in the future, is binding, so that the releasor cannot insist on a subsequent release different in legal effect from that agreed upon.³

But where the parties intend the oral agreement merely as a step in the preliminary negotiations leading up to a written contract which is to be the only binding agreement between the parties, the oral agreement is, of itself, of no validity.⁴ So where the proposals of different contractors contemplated a formal written agreement, awarding the work to one of the contractors is neither a contract nor a contract to make a contract.⁵ This is especially true in public contracts which are required to be in writing.⁶

So where the act of Congress required all contracts made by the commissioners of the District of Columbia to be copied into a book for that purpose and signed by the commissioners, a memorandum on the minutes of the commissioners of the appointment of a referee was not a contract;⁷ and where the bidder for printing knows that a formal written contract is required under the power given by the legislature to a joint committee the oral acceptance of his bid and awarding him the contract is not a valid contract.⁸ But if the statute does not require a written contract, acceptance of a bid may make a complete contract.⁹ A cablegram which reads like acceptance, but adds "contract mailed," is not an acceptance.¹⁰ This principle often overlaps another, already stated,¹¹ and in some of the foregoing cases the oral agreement is purely preliminary, certain terms being left open for future negotiation and possible modification. In such cases the oral agreement is of course of no validity.¹² So an attempted acceptance "accepted, contract to be drawn in accordance with the above proposition or bid. This is about right and will be satisfactory to" the corporation to which the offer was made, was held invalid.¹³

GENERAL NATURE OF FRAUD—MISREPRESENTATION —MISTAKE AND NON-DISCLOSURE.

§55. Introductory.

The outward form of offer and acceptance may exist while in reality there is either no agreement at all, or one which is voidable at the election of one party thereto. This state of affairs, if due to some defect in the offer and acceptance, may exist by reason of one of two things. First: one party may go through the form of making a contract because of an erroneous belief of some sort. In certain cases contracts thus entered into are valid, in others voidable, in others, void. Under this general head are included fraud, either actual or constructive; misrepresentation, mistake and non-disclosure. Anyone of these may exist where the party subject thereto is free from any constraint or overpowering influence. Second: one party may go through the form of making an agreement because his mind is so overpowered that he apparently makes a contract, but does not really consent thereto. Under this general head are included duress and undue influence. Either of these may exist where the party subjected thereto is informed of all the material facts. It is possible and not uncommon for a combination of these two general types to exist: that is, the party seeking relief may be under some overpowering influence and at the same time under some erroneous belief concerning some material fact. Either or both of these states of mind may be further complicated with weakness of mind, drunkenness and the like, not sufficient to destroy the capacity of the party if free from restraint, deceit and the like; yet making the person in question peculiarly susceptible to the effects of the restraint or deceit to which he is subjected. These questions will be considered separately as far as it is practicable.

§56. Definition and nature of fraud.

Fraud as a tort was a term of exact meaning at Common Law. It consisted of a false representation of a material fact made by one who knew that it was false or in some cases who made a positive statement when he knew that he had not information sufficient to warrant his belief in the truth of such statement, made to one who did not know that it was false, with intent to deceive such person and to influence his action, which did deceive such person and influence his action to his damage. Actual fraud, so-called, has in the law of contracts substantially the same elements as those of the tort.¹ The term fraud is used, however, in a less exact and precise sense than this. In equity especially, any unfair dealing which is ground for equitable relief is called fraud and the courts of equity have carefully refrained from confining this idea within the limits of a definition.² Constructive fraud, therefore, though not a very appropriate name, has a well-recognized place in law.³

Fraud must be distinguished from other legal ideas. It differs from mistake in that the statement of the adversary party is the cause of the false impression in fraud, while it cannot be so in mistake. It differs from misrepresentation in that a misrepresentation is made by one who believes it to be true and has reasonable ground for such belief, while fraud is committed by one who knows that his statement is false, or who makes it positively without reasonable grounds for believing it to be true. It differs from non-disclosure in that in fraud the party against whom relief is sought does something by word or deed to mislead the adversary party, while in non-disclosure he merely omits to give information

A misrepresentation is a false statement of a material fact made by one party to a contract to the adversary party, with intent to influence his action, which such adversary party believes and in reliance on which he acts to his damage. Misrepresentation is to be distinguished from mistake in that the erroneous belief in misrepresentation is due to the false statement of the other party to the contract, while in mistake such erroneous belief must be due to some other cause. It is distinguished from fraud in that in fraud the party making the false statement has actual or constructive knowledge of its falsity,¹ and makes the statement with intent to deceive the person to whom it is made;² while misrepresentation is essentially a bona fide misstatement. It differs from non-disclosure in that in misrepresentation the erroneous belief of one party is caused by the acts of the other; while in non-disclosure it is caused by his omission to speak. While eminent authority treats misrepresentation as in part mistake and in part fraud,³ it possesses peculiarities of its own, and is best discussed as a separate topic. Still it must be admitted that the courts often call it mistake.⁴ To add to the confusion, some courts call misrepresentation "legal fraud,"⁵ or "constructive fraud,"⁶ or ex post facto fraud.⁷

§58. Definition and nature of mistake.

Mistake is a term which includes a number of distinct legal concepts, which have in common no more than this, that the party seeking relief was not aware of some fact or rule of law when he entered into the contract in question. A general definition of mistake, which, like an accurate definition will at least indicate the extent and limits of the thing defined, is practically impossible.¹ In the first place, mistake may be (1) of fact, or (2) of law. In the second place, in determining how far mistake is operative we must ascertain (1) whether it affects the execution and the essential elements of a contract, or (2) whether it affects some collateral material matter, or (3) whether it affects some collateral immaterial matter; or (4) whether the parties have made a valid oral contract free from mistake, but a mistake in expressing its terms has been made in reducing it to writing, or (5) whether payment has been made under mistake where no liability in fact existed. Each of these forms of mistake is so essentially different from the others in its nature, and often in its legal effects, that no definition covering all these diverse forms can be framed. However, some definitions, helpful if not comprehensive, have been attempted. Mistake in the broad sense of the term is said to be "that result of ignorance of law or of fact, which has misled a person to commit that which, if he had not been in error, he would not have his own misrepresentation, even where it was unintentional, is as much open to an imputation of fraud as if its falsity had been known to him." Tyson v. Passmore, 2 Pa. St. 122; 44 Am. Dec. 181.

tions and qualifications more important than itself. This is not surprising, in view of the fact that the whole doctrine is an invasion or restriction upon that most fundamental rule of the law, that contracts which parties see fit to make shall be enforced, and in view of the further consideration that one or both of the parties is often, if not usually, ignorant or forgetful of some facts, thoughtfulness of which might vary his conduct." Kowalke v. Light Co., 103 Wis. 472; 74 Am. St. Rep. 877; 79 N. W. 762.

done.”² “A mistake of fact is an unconscious ignorance or forgetfulness of the existence or non-existence of a fact, past or present, material to the contract.”³

§59. Definition and nature of non-disclosure.

Pure non-disclosure, as the name implies, is the omission to disclose to the adversary party facts not known to him but known to the party so omitting to make disclosure. It differs from fraud and misrepresentation in that the party omitting to make disclosure does nothing in pure non-disclosure by word or act to mislead the adversary party. While in many respects analogous to mistake, it differs therefrom in this: in pure mistake, the adversary party is not aware of the existence of the mistake, in non-disclosure, he is. It must be conceded, however, that many of the cases classed under mistake are really cases of non-disclosure. Active concealment is a form of fraud and is discussed in connection therewith.¹

Each of the subjects of fraud, misrepresentation, mistake and non-disclosure must be considered, with reference to its point of contact with the contract. Each of them may (1) concern some one of the essential elements of the contract or (2) concern some collateral though often material matter.

(1) The essential elements of a contract are the parties, the subject-matter, the consideration and the offer and acceptance, which last, in one sense, includes the others. We have already seen in discussing offer and acceptance¹ that the offer as made must be accepted fully and completely, to constitute an agreement. If there is an attempted acceptance by a party other than the one to whom the offer is made, or an acceptance concerning a different subject-matter or consideration, or an acceptance which attempts to modify the terms of the offer, no contract exists. This attempted acceptance, however, may be regarded as a counter-proposition which may in turn be accepted by the original offerer by words or acts. The function of fraud, misrepresentation, mistake, or non-disclosure as to an essential element of a contract is to conceal from one or both of the parties thereto the fact that in reality they have never agreed.² The further function of fraud, misrepresentation, mistake or non-disclosure is to rebut the presumption of offer and acceptance that would otherwise arise from the conduct of the parties. Thus if A makes an offer to B and X accepts, no contract arises. If A acts on X's offer, it would be inferred that A had accepted X's proposition, as that is the legal effect of X's nominal acceptance. A's mistake as to X's identity rebuts the inference that he has accepted X's offer. Like reasoning applies to mistakes in the subject-matter or consideration. If A makes an offer to B, and B attempts to accept with a modification, no contract arises, B's "acceptance" being a rejection with a counter-proposition. If A acts on B's counter-proposition, an acceptance thereof might be inferred from A's conduct. This inference may be rebutted by showing that A, by operative mistake, understood that B had accepted his offer as he made it. Like considerations apply to fraud, misrepresentation and non-disclosure as to an essential element of the contract. They each, in proper cases prevent offer and acceptance from existing where without one of them, the parties would be, by the inevitable legal effect of their conduct, precluded from denying the existence of a contract. Their appearance in an essential element of the contract, therefore, renders it ordinarily void. The principles involved as to fraud, misrepresentation, mistake or non-disclosure concerning an essential element of a contract are discussed most fully under mistake. Indeed some authorities attempt to include them all as forms of mistake. This is incorrect as certain complications, such as negligence lead to different results in some of these subjects from that reached in others.

² Thus in speaking of a mistake as to the identity of the reality contracted for the court said: "In this case the minds of the parties never

(2) On the other hand, the party to the contract may understand the identity of the adversary party, the consideration, the subject-matter, and the terms of the contract; and may be willing to enter into such contract. His willingness so to enter may, however, be due to an erroneous belief as to some collateral, though possibly highly material matter. This erroneous belief may be caused by fraud, misrepresentation, mistake or non-disclosure. For lack of a better term this may be said to affect a matter of inducement. Such a contract is never void. In some cases it is voidable, in others, valid. It will thus be seen that while fraud, misrepresentation, mistake, and non-disclosure have sharp points of contrast, each with the other, the difference between any two of them is slight when compared with the difference between one of them, for instance, mistake, as affecting some essential element of the contract, and the same defect as affecting some collateral matter. Each of these is more like the others in questions affecting an essential element of the contract than it is like the same defect as affecting a matter of inducement. Accordingly each of these topics will be considered as affecting (1) an essential element of a contract; and (2) a matter of inducement. Matters of inducement will be considered (1) as questions of fact and (2) as question of law.

It may be observed before beginning a discussion of the topics of fraud, misrepresentation, mistake and non-disclosure, that if such terms are properly used they all apply to facts which are not carried into the contract by the express stipulation of the parties, and made terms thereof. The validity of the contract may of course be expressly conditioned upon the existence or non-existence of specific facts.¹ In such cases, no enforceable contract can be said to exist if the fact is not as stipulated, even though no mistake is made as to the identity of the adversary party, or the subject-matter or the terms of the contract.² Thus where A agreed to make a flouring mill for B, and as both A and B assumed that X's mill produced fifty-five per cent. flour, they agreed that taking X's mill as a basis, the mill to be furnished by A should produce flour five per cent. better than the fifty-five per cent. flour produced by X's mill. Since X's mill did not produce fifty-five per cent. flour, and he refused to convert it so as to make that grade, the court held that the contract between A and B was based on a mistake and was unenforceable.³ When the existence of a certain fact is made a term of the contract, certain results follow which show that false statements concerning such fact cannot amount to fraud and the like. The fact that the parties have conditioned the validity of such contract on the existence of such fact shows that the party to whom such representation is made does not rely upon the truth of such statement; for if he had, he would not have stipulated for the event of its proving false. Accordingly, even if the other elements of fraud are present it is held in many jurisdictions that a false statement of this sort cannot be fraud, since it is not relied upon.⁴ So it is held in many jurisdictions that exacting a warranty upon a matter concerning which a prior representation has been made, merges such representation, and prevents it, even if false, from amounting to fraud or misrepresentation.⁵ Thus a warranty as to the speed of a steamboat, inserted in a contract, prevents a prior false representation as to its speed from amounting to fraud.⁶ Other courts treat a false warranty as fraud.⁷ Whether the reliance was solely on the warranty, or in part on the warranty and in part on the fraudulent representation is treated as a question of fact.⁸ If a contract is conditioned on the existence of a given fact, the contract is discharged if such fact is not as stipulated; or if made a condition precedent, the contract never takes effect even if all the elements of operative fraud, mistake, misrepresentation, or non-disclosure, may be lacking. In the technically correct use of the term, misrepresentation concerns a matter which though material is not made one of the terms of the contract. If the false statement is carried into the contract and becomes one of the terms thereof, as a condition precedent,⁹ or a warranty,¹⁰ different questions arise from those found in mere misrepresentation. It is rather a case of breach, failure of a condition precedent, and the like. However such cases are often explained on the theory of misrepresentation. Thus a contract for the sale of realty expressly conditioned to be void if vendor's representations concerning it should prove untrue, may be avoided in that case even though such representations were made in good faith.¹¹ Among the most prominent examples of misrepresentations which are made terms of contracts are warranties in insurance contracts. A warranty in insurance is in effect a clause providing that the policy shall not be binding unless the statements warranted are literally true.¹² To enable a statement to amount to a warranty, the policy must contain a stipulation to that effect. It must not merely be made in the application.¹³ A warranty may be created by a clause expressly providing that the policy shall not take effect unless such facts are as stated,¹⁴ or by a clause warranting the truth of certain statements.¹⁵ Such a warranty, if made a part of the policy becomes a condition precedent.¹⁶ The effect of such warranties is to permit the insurance company to avoid the policy if the statement thus warranted is untrue, irrespective of other questions that would be important in fraud, misrepresentation, or mistake.¹⁷ A warranty in an insurance policy if broken avoids the contract by reason solely of the non-existence of the fact warranted, without any reference to the fraud of the insured.¹⁸ That he believes in good faith that the statement as made by him is true does not prevent the warranty from avoiding the policy.¹⁹ Breach of warranty avoids the policy even if the company through its agent is fully advised of the real state of facts.²⁰ Breach of warranty will in the absence of statute avoid a contract even if the fact warranted was immaterial.²¹ If material, the falsity of the statement thus warranted avoids the contract even more clearly. Thus in fire insurance the falsity of a warranty as to title;²² the existence²³ or amount²⁴ of incumbrances upon the property insured;²⁵ in life insurance the falsity of a warranted statement as to when insured consulted a physician,²⁶ or the occupation of insured,²⁷ or previous applications for insurance made by him,²⁸ and in guaranty insurance the amount of losses in the preceding year,²⁹ are all material and avoid the policy if false. The existence of a chattel mortgage has been held immaterial.³⁰ So the warranty may involve a future fact which could not be the subject of fraud.³¹ The effect of the doctrine of warranties in insurance has been so oppressive that they are not favored in construction. Wherever consistent with the intention of the parties a statement is construed as a representation rather than as a warranty.³² Even the use of the word "warrant" is not conclusive, if the context shows that the statement may be taken fairly as a representation.³³ This result is reached by treating the warranty as

I.—FRAUD.

§62. Fraud as to an essential element of a contract.

Fraud as to an essential element of a contract exists where one party thereto intentionally misleads the other as to one of the elements of the contract into which they are entering. A fraudulent representation as to the identity of the subject matter,¹ as where, in addition to false statements as to quality, a tract of land is pointed out which is not the one conveyed,² or of the adversary party, where the identity of such party is material,³ each prevents the apparent offer and acceptance from constituting a contract. A fraudulent misstatement of the terms of an oral contract when so made as to deceive the adversary party avoids the contract. Thus X as agent for A had sold goods to B, payable on delivery. B represented to A that X had agreed for a sale on credit, and B sent A an alleged copy of a letter from X authorizing such credit. As X was absent when B wrote, A delivered the goods to B on credit. It was held that B could recover the goods.⁴

The commonest form of fraud in the factum exists where an instrument in writing is drawn up and signed by one party under a false belief as to its contents, due to the fraud of the adversary party. In such case the contract is generally held to be void.¹ Hence such a contract need not be rescinded,² and the party seeking to avoid liability need not return what he has received thereunder.³ Thus substituting a quit-claim deed for a mortgage,⁴ or a deed for a power to collect rents,⁵ omission to read to mortgagor a clause assuming a mortgage,⁶ or inserting without the knowledge of the adversary party a clause making a certain pledge collateral security for all debts owing, instead of for the debt in question,⁷ a false statement as to the covenants

If the party who has been induced to execute a written contract by fraudulent representations as to its contents seeks to avoid liability thereunder, it is clear that he has never in fact assented to the contract as written. Whether the circumstances attending the execution may not under some circumstances estop him from making this defense is a question upon which there is a conflict of authority. Some courts make the degree of care exercised by the defrauded party the test as to his liability. If on the other hand the party to whom the false statement is made reads the instrument, no fraud exists,⁸ as he has full knowledge of all material facts.⁹ So if the party alleging fraud is advised of such facts as should put him especially upon inquiry, as where he knows that an assignment has been prepared by the assignee and forwarded to the latter's attorneys,¹⁰ he cannot allege fraud where he omits to read the instrument.

circumstances, a different result is reached if the parties to the contract are in relations of special trust and confidence towards each other. The doctrine here involved is a special application of constructive fraud. As will be discussed hereafter,¹ many statements which would not amount to actual fraud if made by one party who is dealing with the other at arm's length, do amount to constructive fraud when made by one who occupies relations of special trust and confidence towards another. Hence even in jurisdictions where representation as to the contents of a written contract is held not to be fraud if the adversary party has a fair opportunity to read such contract and the parties are dealing at arm's length, such representations are treated as amounting to fraud if made by the superior in a relation of special trust and confidence.² Thus where a child relies on statements of its parent as to the contents of a written contract,³ or a nephew relies on the statements of an aunt who was in loco parentis to him,⁴ or a client relies on the statements of his attorney,⁵ fraud exists though the party reposing such confidence had an opportunity to read the contract in question.

If the instrument is negotiable, and is in the hands of bona fide holder, the question of negligence is held the test of liability. If the maker signed through negligence, he is liable to a bona fide holder of such paper.⁴ An assignee who takes with notice of the fraud cannot enforce it against the maker.⁵

§67. Effect of fraud of third person.

One who signs a written contract in ignorance of its contents, being able to read but relying on the representations of a third party, is bound thereby,¹ as the doctrines of mistake apply, and not those of fraud.² Thus where A signed a guaranty payable to B, relying on the representation of C, the principal debtor, that it was an application for a license, A cannot avoid liability on the contract of guaranty.³ If the third party, however, is the agent of the adversary party to the contract, his fraud will be considered to be that of his principal.⁴

press the contract into which the defrauded party was induced to believe that he was entering.¹ Thus where by fraudulent misrepresentation of the contents of a lease, lessor is induced to execute a lease, it may be reformed to express the oral agreement.²

II. MISREPRESENTATION.

§69. Misrepresentation as to an essential element of the contract.

Misrepresentation of an essential element of a contract, as distinguished from mistake on the one side and fraud on the other, is necessarily quite rare. Indeed in the cases decided on that topic it is often hard to determine whether the misrepresentation does not amount to fraud. The difficulty is further complicated by the use which some courts make of the term "legal fraud" to designate misrepresentation.¹ When the question of the effect of misrepresentation as to an essential element is presented for adjudication, it seems clear both from the authorities as well as on principle, that error as to an essential element of the contract, due to misrepresentation by the adversary party, makes a contract void no less than mistake not due to misrepresentation. Thus a misrepresentation as to the contents of a written instrument will avoid it.² So misrepresentation as to the existence of the liability or property which is the subject matter of the contract, as where A represented that a parcel of money entrusted to B to be delivered to A had not been so delivered,³ or that there was a large amount of growing timber on a given tract of land,⁴ or as to the nature and kind of a bond sold by one party to the other,⁵ or as to the amount of such liability,⁶ as where an indebtedness incurred before the time covered by a bond of indemnity was represented to have been incurred during such time,⁷ may be ground for rescission. So a misrepresentation as to the identity of all,⁸ or a part,⁹ of a tract of realty conveyed, is ground for rescission. In some of these cases formal rescission in equity has been granted,¹⁰ and in others, informal rescission at law by allowing recovery of the purchase money on tendering a reconveyance.¹¹ If the misrepresentation concerns an essential element of the contract, such as the subject-matter, it is material even if the subject-matter actually in existence is as valuable as that represented.¹²

the negligence of the party misled by mistake to ascertain the contents of the written contract may prevent him from obtaining relief,¹ while in misrepresentation we find substantially the same conflict of authority as in cases of fraud as to the contents of a written contract. In some cases of misrepresentation as to the contents of a written contract, it is held the negligence of the party misled does not prevent him from treating the contract as void in an action between the immediate parties to such contract.² In other jurisdictions misrepresentations as to the contents of a written contract are held not to make the contract void even as between the immediate parties to such contract, if the party misled was guilty of negligence in not ascertaining the contents of the instrument.³ Thus where A who could read and had agreed to sign a guaranty to B for X to cover future indebtedness, signed an instrument from which a clause containing a guaranty for past indebtedness was not erased, cannot avoid liability on such covenant though B had told A that all the clauses assuming such liability were erased and had showed A what clauses to erase from the printed form.⁴ In any event, if

For the distinction in this respect between mistake and misrepresentation see obiter in Bates v. Harte, 124 Ala. 427; 82 Am. St. Rep. 186; 26 So. 898. See also the following expression of opinion: "Plaintiff did not know, so far as appears, that defendant had not read and compared the two. He had a right to presume he had, and cannot be held responsible by defendant for reposing too much confidence in his assurances." Haubert v. Mausschart, 89 Cal. 433, 436; 26 Pac. 899.

⁴ The court said: "The defendant does not state that plaintiffs used any artifice to prevent him from reading the contract, nor does he state that he was unacquainted with the English language or that he could not read. In fact no excuse whatever is given, except that he

the person misled was not negligent in relying on the representations of the adversary party as to the contents of the contract, he may avoid it.⁵ Thus where the agent of a railroad company sold A a ticket alleged to be correct in form, but the time limit of which had in fact expired, and A was unable to read the ticket because the station was dimly lighted, A is not bound by the terms of the ticket.⁶

So where a misrepresentation is made concerning an essential feature of the contract, the negligence of the party to whom such representation is made, whereby he is misled by it, does not prevent him from obtaining relief.⁷ Thus where A sold B a worthless bond, representing it to be of a kind that B knew was good, B may avoid the sale though he had a chance to inspect the bond.⁸ If the party seeking rescission has been careless in omitting to investigate the truth of the statements made to him, rescission may be had at his costs.⁹

III. MISTAKE.

§71. Mistake as to an essential element of the contract.

A contract entered into because of mistake as to an essential element is void.¹ While this general rule is substantially unquestioned, considerable difficulty is found in determining signed the contract relying on the representation of plaintiff as to its contents. This is inexcusable neglect and the defendant must suffer the consequences of his own folly. The effect of such a rule as that claimed by appellant would be to render written contracts of but little practical value over those existing in parol only." McCormack v. Molburg, 43 Ia. 561, 562; quoted in Reid v. Bradley, 105 Ia. 220; 74 N. W. 896; so Glenn v. Statler, 42 Ia. 107.

whether mistake applies to an essential feature of a contract or a collateral matter.² A detailed discussion of the forms of mistake in an essential feature of a contract is therefore necessary, including mistakes as to the identity of the adversary party, as to the identity or existence of the subject-matter and as to the terms and contents of the contract.

§72. Mistake as to existence of subject-matter or consideration.

If the parties to a contract enter into it under the belief that the subject-matter or consideration is in existence, and in effect condition their contract thereon, no contract exists if the subject-matter is not then in existence.¹ Thus a lease of property to be used for manufacturing purposes can be avoided where entered into under a mistake as to water rights which were thought to be easements appurtenant to such realty and without which it could not be used for such purposes.² Thus a release made in ignorance of the existence of a claim,³ or as to the existence of an estate contracted for⁴ does not affect such right. If A, with whom goods have been deposited is unable to find them, believes that they are lost, and so gives his check therefor, he may, on discovering the goods on the day following, and before payment of the check, stop such payment.⁵ So if A gives his note to B, thinking that there is a balance due from him to B for which such note is given, when in fact nothing is due, such note may be avoided as to B or an indorsee with notice.⁶ Thus if A is mistaken as to the amount of his indebtedness and under such mistake gives a note for too large an amount, equity will give rescission and cancel the note on payment of the amount due,⁷ and if he has overpaid his debt will decree repayment of such excess.⁸ A similar rule exists where one by mistake assumes a debt due him to be smaller than it is.⁹ So where X had forged A's name to a note to B, and induced A to borrow money from B and to give a note therefor and a mortgage securing such note "together with any sums that I now owe" B, A not knowing of the existence of the forged note, it was held that the mortgage could not be enforced against A for the forged note.¹⁰ So if under a mistaken belief that no credit had been given for a payment which had been made, and in fact credited, the creditor gives a receipt in full on payment of less than the real amount due in pursuance of a contract settling the account, he may recover such difference.¹¹ Any other contract entered into

under mistake as to the amount due on a pre-existing liability and based thereon, may be avoided for such mistake.¹² Where A has valid insurance on B's life, and thinking B still alive, and being unable to continue paying the premiums, surrenders it ten days after B's death for a paid-up policy, A may avoid the surrender and enforce the policy,¹³ and a like rule applies where insurance on a vessel is cancelled after the loss, in ignorance of such loss,¹⁴ or where insurance is effected on a vessel already lost, the insured knowing of the loss and the insurer being ignorant thereof.¹⁵

This proposition implies that the parties are not in ignorance whether the subject-matter is in existence or not, deliberately assuming the risk of its non-existence. Where the parties are aware that the existence of the subject matter is doubtful, and contract with reference thereto, each party taking the chances of the event's being adverse to himself, the contract is valid.¹⁶

If the identity of the adversary party is material, no contract exists where one party to the contract is mistaken as to the identity of such adversary party.¹ Such identity is material where the personality of the adversary party is a factor in inducing the one party to enter into the contract; as where credit is extended and the financial responsibility of the party thus becomes an important element,² or if he is for any reason unwilling to deal with the party as to whose identity he was mistaken and who is seeking to enforce the contract, as where such adversary party is a notorious usurer, whom the other party was seeking to avoid in business and with whom he had refused to deal;³ or where for any reason he has refused to deal with him.⁴

A common example of this mistake is found where A makes an offer to B, and C accepts it, claiming that he is B. In such case, if B's identity is material, no title passes to property delivered by A to C under the contract,⁵ and A can recover the property or its value, even from a bona fide purchaser⁶ or pledgee,⁷ claiming title under C.

The vendee is not bound where the personality of the vendor is material, and vendee is mistaken as to his identity.⁸ Thus where A had bought ice from B and had quit doing business with him because he was dissatisfied with him and bought from C; and C sold his business to B, who without notifying A of the change, continued to deliver ice to him, B was not allowed to recover the price of the ice thus delivered.⁹ So a mistake in the identity of the opposite party, the real party being a corporation with a small capital, and the supposed party being a firm with a large capital, the names being identical, is ground for rescinding an executory contract.¹⁰ So where A had dealt with a firm of which B was agent, and the firm had incorporated without A's knowledge, and B as agent for the new corporation did not disclose the incorporation to A, A was allowed to hold the members of the corporation as partners.¹¹

On the other hand, if the identity of the adversary party is not material, mistake therein does not affect the validity of the contract.¹² Thus where A was ready to contract with anyone having authority to lease a certain canal boat, he could not avoid his contract because he was mistaken as to who the real owner was.¹³ So if A makes an offer to B, and C delivers his own property in performance of the contract, A cannot avoid liability under the contract if he knows that C is delivering his own property.¹⁴ Thus a principal cannot refuse to pay commissions to his broker because the latter has concealed the identity of the real party from his principal where it does not appear that his identity was material.¹⁵

In any event, if the contract is a nullity because of mistake as to the identity of the adversary party, acquiescence in a contract fully executed for an unreasonable time, with full knowledge of the facts will prevent the party from obtaining relief.¹⁶ Thus making use, after notice of mistake, of goods furnished under such mistake makes the party so using them liable therefor.¹⁷

§74. Mistake as to identity of subject-matter or consideration.

If A makes an offer to B concerning a given subject-matter, X; and B understands that A is making an offer concerning Y, and accepts the offer concerning Y, no contract exists.¹ Thus where A, an auctioneer, offered lot 24, and B, understanding that it was lot 25, made a bid thereon which was accepted, no valid contract was made.² So where A offered to sell B a lot, and X, a stranger to the contract, pointed out the wrong piece of land, and B accepted, A's offer under such mistaken impression, no contract existed.³ So a mistake as to the tract of land agreed upon,⁴ or as to the location of a boundary line if "so material as to go to the essence of the contract,"⁵ prevents any contract from existing. A mistake as to the amount of a note, assumed as part of the purchase price of stock, does not make the contract void, if the amount is less than the party assuming it agreed to pay.⁶ In this connection, it must be noted that if B accepts the offer, knowing that he does not know exactly where the land is located, he cannot make his ignorance a means of avoiding liability.⁷ Where the parties are mistaken as to the identity of the property contracted for, one of them cannot have the contract, if in writing, reformed so as to express his understanding of what the property was.⁸ Mistake as to the identity of the subject-matter may affect a part of the property contracted for, and not the whole of it.⁹ Thus if the boundaries of a tract conveyed are known, the general rule is that a slightly erroneous estimate of its area is not such mistake as to call for rescission.¹⁰ A considerable deficiency in area, however, has been treated as a mistake which will justify rescission, as where the contract of sale of a farm containing 135 acres is entered into under the mistaken belief that it contains "about two hundred acres."¹¹ So A sold land to B, both understanding that the tract contained two hundred fifty acres. B had it surveyed, and the surveyor, by an error in computation estimated the tract at one hundred ninety-eight acres. To make up this deficiency A agreed to deed B fifty acres more, and did so. B sold the original tract to C, who surveyed it and found two hundred fifty acres. A sued B and it was held that B must return the fifty-acre tract or make compensation.¹² Other appropriate relief is given for a material deficiency or excess in quantity, as quieting title to the excess, leaving it in vendor,¹³ or allowing compensation for a deficiency¹⁴ or excess.¹⁵ Occasionally we find relief refused in cases of this class on the ground that the party seeking relief has been guilty of negligence in not ascertaining the area in advance.¹⁶

Mistake as to the existence of part of the subject-matter may be made in transactions other than sales of realty. So where A by mistake handed B a ten-dollar gold piece of private coinage by mistake for a half dollar,¹⁷ or where A made a settlement with B for milk shipped by B to A, A assuming that the cans of milk contained five gallons each, when in fact they held less, some being spilled in transitu,¹⁸ or A agreed to deliver a certain amount of powder for B, by mistake as to the number of kegs and the weight of each keg,¹⁹ such mistake avoids each of these contracts.

§75. Mistake as to contents of written contract.

If the contract is in writing and a party who has signed it wishes to avoid liability thereon on the ground that he did not know its contents, the question, in the absence of misrepresentation, fraud, undue influence and the like, turns on whether he was guilty of negligence in signing without knowing its contents. If he is not guilty of negligence,¹ as where he cannot read at all,² or cannot read or speak the language in which the instrument is written,³ or is practically blind,⁴ he is not bound by the contract if he signs it in mistake as to the contents

On the other hand, if he can read or is otherwise guilty of negligence in not informing himself as to the contents of the written contract, and signs or accepts it with full opportunity of informing himself as to its contents, he cannot avoid liability on the ground that he was mistaken as to its contents, in the absence of fraud or misrepresentation.¹ The application of this rule is clearest where the party who signs the instrument is cannot have relief from a judgment thereon on the ground that he did not know that it contained a power of attorney.³ Nor can A avoid a release of damages for an injury where he signed it without reading it, thinking it a receipt for money paid him for the time lost by such injury;⁴ or knowing it is a receipt for money paid from a relief fund, but not knowing that it provides for a release of the railroad from liability;⁵ nor can A avoid a contract which he signed without striking out a clause which he intended to strike out, B being ignorant of such intention.⁶ So where A signed and acknowledged an assignment of an insurance policy, indorsed on such policy, she could not have such assignment set aside on the ground that she had not read it and thought it was a receipt for money.⁷ If the written contract is read correctly, a party executing it cannot avoid liability because he himself was not able to read.⁸ Nor can one who neither tries to read the contract nor have it read to him avoid the contract on the ground of his own illiteracy.⁹ So where the party signing the contract is able to read, and there is no misrepresentation, undue influence, and the like, the fact that he was "worried in mind and did not read it" does not release him from liability thereon.¹⁰ The same rule applies if one reads the contract and misinterprets

If A makes an offer in certain terms, and B accepts terms different from those offered, no contract exists, although each party may, for the time being, believe that the contract as understood by himself is in force.¹ Thus where the parties misunderstand the price on which they think they have agreed, as where A offers to sell two lots at $2,500 each, and B understanding it to be $2,500 for the two, accepts,² or where A makes an offer to B for $165, and B accepts, understanding the offer to be $65,³ or where A makes an offer of sale to B for $850, and B accepts, thinking that the offer is for $750,⁴ or where A asks the freight to a given station X, and the agent of the railroad understands that the station in question is Y, and gives a rate to Y, which is six dollars less than the rate to X,⁵ or where A asks the rate for a carload of melons and grapes, and the agent of the railroad company understands that the car is to contain melons and vegetables, and accordingly gives a lower rate,⁶ or where A asks the price for transporting five hundred bundles of lath, and B, the agent of the carrier, understands that only one hundred bundles of lath are to be transported, and gives him a rate accordingly,⁷ no contract exists.

Since no contract exists, the one party cannot have the written contract made in accordance with the supposed oral contract reformed so as to express his own understanding,⁸ but rescission may be had.⁹

If each party can be placed in statu quo, rescission is the only remedy where the contract is performed by one party in whole or in part.¹⁰ If the parties cannot be placed in statu quo, the one who has received property or services of value must pay a reasonable compensation therefor irrespective of what his understanding of the terms was.¹¹ Thus where under a misunderstanding as to freight rates, a railroad transports goods for A, A must pay a reasonable price therefor, though higher than the rate which A understood.¹² Similar considerations have induced the courts to hold that there was no contract where an offer was changed by mistake in transmitting a telegram from $1.70 to $1.07,¹³ or where, by an ambiguity in A's letter, A's offer of $2,000 was understood by B as an offer of $35 an acre for sixty acres.¹⁴ not want to pay over $2,000 and thought $35 an acre a big price and that was what it would cost with taxes. B accepted, thinking that his offer was for $2,100. On B's refusing to deliver the deed without receiving $2,100, A sued for specific performance which was refused; the court seeming to hold that A might have a right of action at law, and saying: "In strict law and by the words of the letters of the parties, we think the parties made a contract; but we also think that in fact and in equity, the minds of the parties never came together; that they really never agreed to the same thing; and therefore in equity and good conscience they did not make a contract or at least they did not

If A enters into a contract knowing that he has not sufficient or exact knowledge of a material fact, he cannot avoid such contract on the ground of mistake because such fact turns out differently from what he had hoped.¹ Where a woman releases dower, consciously ignorant whether she has a dower interest in the property released or not,² or releases a claim for personal injuries, consciously ignorant whether she is pregnant or not,³ or where a vendee buys land he has never seen, consciously ignorant of its location or quality,⁴ none of them can avoid the contract because the event results differently from their anticipations. So where A's life was insured by X in favor of B, and after A had disappeared and been absent a long time, B sued X, and to compromise the suit X agreed to pay a certain sum down and a further sum in a certain time, X is bound to make such payment, though before it falls due, it is learned that A is alive, since while both parties thought it probable that he was dead, both knew that they were really ignorant as to the fact.⁵ This principle, however, is not always adhered in those cases which depart from the general rule and allow rescission for a mistake of fact in the inducement.⁶ Thus where a county sold a claim for swamp lands, of doubtful validity, it was allowed to avoid such sale where an allowance of a large tract had been made on such claim shortly before the sale, unknown to the county.⁷

The general rules on the subject of this class of mistake are subject to the following qualifications. Every sane person is held to intend the legal consequences of his voluntary acts. Accordingly, if a person of legal capacity, and not acting under fraud, misrepresentation, duress, or undue influence, goes through the outward form of binding himself by contract, he cannot avoid liability thereon by claiming that unknown to the adversary party, he made his offer or acceptance under mistake of fact, and that he did not intend to make such offer.¹

The court, in holding that rescission should be allowed in equity, said that the county "supposed and had reason to suppose not only that no such allowance had been made but that it was doubtful whether it ever would be made." 47 Ia. 96. This reasoning would lead to the conclusion that rescission could not be had if the authorities cited earlier in this section are to be regarded as correct. A complicating fact in this case is that the vendee of the county knew of such allowance and did not disclose it. See ch. IX.

Thus where A makes an offer, lower than he intended, through his miscalculation² or that of his agent,³ or where the mistake arises in sending a telegram from a general agent to a local agent,⁴ or in sending a telegram from the principal to his agent by reason of which the agent makes a contract on behalf of his principal, different from that intended by the latter,⁵ or A orders more than he intends to,⁶ and B accepts without knowledge of A's mistake, A is bound. If through mistake of the offerer's agent, the offer is made in terms different from that authorized by the offerer, and the offeree accepts it without knowing of such mistake, the offerer is bound by the terms of the offer as made.⁷ Thus where the agent of a railroad company offered a rate of sixty-nine and one-half cents per hundred pounds for cotton, the rate being really eighty-nine and one-half cents, the railroad was bound by the offer if accepted before revocation.⁸ If the offerer makes an offer by telegram and his offer is transmitted incorrectly, a question arises as to whether he is bound by its acceptance in the altered form. Some courts hold that for this purpose the telegraph company is the agent of the offerer, and that he is bound.⁹ The question usually arises in an action by the offerer against the telegraph company for damages. If he is bound by the offer as accepted, he is allowed to recover if the telegraph company is negligent.¹⁰ Some courts have allowed the offerer to recover even if he might possibly have avoided the contract, holding that he was not bound to engage in "long and doubtful litigation" in attempting to rescind.¹¹ In other jurisdictions the offerer is not allowed to recover on the theory that he is not bound.¹² If the mistake is evident on the face of the telegram the offerer is not bound.¹³ Some authorities allow greater latitude in relieving against mistakes of the class discussed in this section. Thus where A, a member of a firm of quarrymen, did not himself know the price of monuments, and relied on the estimates of the foreman, relief was given where such foreman made a mistake in computation.¹⁴

Some courts lay it down as a broad principle that one who enters into a contract under mistake of fact due to his own negligence, concerning which he could with reasonable diligence have learned the truth, cannot have relief.¹ This rule has been applied to mistakes as to area² or boundary³ of land; as to the amount of assets in a firm where one partner is buying out another,⁴ and to the amount due on a note in the possession of the party alleging mistake.⁵ When this rule is invoked, the facts usually show that the party alleging mistake either knew the facts before entering into the contract,⁶ or that the mistake was really one of law,⁷ or as to a matter of inducement,⁸ or that the mistake was as to the contents of a written contract,⁹ or that he entered into the contract in conscious ignorance of the facts,¹⁰ or that the mistake was as to an immaterial matter,¹¹ or that the evidence failed to prove mistake,¹² and such cases do not therefor rest solely on the ground of negligence. Thus where A, the holder of the first mortgage, believes that B, the holder of the second mortgage, has abandoned his rights under his mortgage, and A accordingly takes security for his debt which is subsequent to B's mortgage and cancels his first mortgage, without making any inquiry as to B's having abandoned his second mortgage, he cannot have the cancellation of his first mortgage set aside.¹³

an essential element even if the party seeking relief might with diligence have discovered the truth;¹⁴ as where the vendee settled for milk sold and delivered to him, on the erroneous assumption that the cans in which it was shipped each contained eight gallons.¹⁵ So where A, a warehouseman, was unable to find property stored with him by B, and after full opportunity for investigation, A came to the conclusion that the property had been stolen, and gave B his check therefor, it was held that he could stop payment of the check on finding the property soon after the check was given.¹⁶

The effect of negligence in omitting to learn the terms of a written contract has been discussed elsewhere.¹⁷

Since mistake in inducement is not a ground for relief,¹⁸ the question of the negligence of the party seeking relief is necessarily immaterial.

§81. Forgetfulness as mistake.

If a party to a contract has known of a material fact and has entered into such contract because he has forgotten such fact, he is not given relief on the ground of mistake.¹ Thus forgetfulness by vendor of subsisting equities in property belonging to another does not entitle vendor to relief,² nor does forgetfulness of the insolvency of a corporation.³ There is, however, some authority for treating forgetfulness as mistake. Thus where A sold land to B, meaning to reserve an easement in an aqueduct thereon, of which aqueduct B had no knowledge when he bought the land and which was worth much more than the cost of the land, it was held that A might have the easement or rescission at B's election.⁴

Whatever the relation of the mistake to the contract, if it concerns a matter which is not material thereto, no relief is given on the ground of mistake.¹ Thus a slight mistake as to area² or boundary line³ is held not to justify rescission. So a mistake as to one boundary line, the vendee believing that the tract in question included an abandoned shaft once used for mining gold, is not ground for relief where the evidence shows that the land was sold for mining purposes and that the existence of such shaft would not in any way increase its value, and did not in any way affect vendee.⁴ On the other hand, a serious discrepancy in area, as where a tract of one hundred thirty-five acres was thought to contain two hundred acres,⁵ or a tract of two hundred fifty acres was thought to contain only one hundred ninety-eight,⁶ may be ground for rescission.

A contract entered into under mistake as to an essential element is, properly speaking, void. At the same time courts sometimes speak of ratifying it. Strictly speaking, this is a contradiction in terms, as a void contract is not subject to ratification. What is meant by ratification is that the original transaction may be treated as at least an offer to the party affected by the mistake, which may be accepted by him if not withdrawn by the adversary party, and his acquiescence therein with full knowledge of the facts is such acceptance.¹ Thus where grantee accepted a deed under mistake as to the identity of the realty conveyed, and after learning of such mistake, he retains such realty until the price of the realty goes down, he cannot then avoid the conveyance.² Where a mistake in the inducement is not ground for avoiding a contract, ratification is, of course, not necessary.³

Mistake in the expression is said to be cured by subsequent ratification.⁴ Strictly speaking, this means that the parties may by acquiescence substitute the contract, as written, for their original contract. Thus where a note has been renewed several times, a deed intended as a mortgage cannot be avoided because given to the president of the bank instead of to the bank.⁵ So accepting an insurance policy waives mistake as to its date.⁶ Where mistake exists of a type to justify rescission, the party seeking rescission may have it if he seeks it promptly on discovering the mistake;⁷ while if he delays unreasonably,⁸ and the adversary party changes his position so that he cannot be placed in statu quo,⁹ rescission will be denied.¹⁰ An alteration in position not affecting substantial rights does not of itself prevent rescission. Thus where a vendee of State school lands paid no interest to the State, but the State did not attempt to forfeit such lands therefor, rescission of a conveyance of such lands was allowed.¹¹ If the party against whom rescission is sought knew of the adversary party's mistake and

If he be silent and continue to treat the property as his own, he will be held to have waived the objection, and will be conclusively bound by the contract, as if the mistake or fraud had not occurred. He is not permitted to play fast and loose. Delay and vacillation are fatal to the right which had before subsisted." Grymes v. Sanders, 93 U. S. 55. 62.

took advantage of it, rescission may be had against him even where he cannot be placed in statu quo.¹² Thus, A was executor of X's will, and in payment of a legacy given by X to Y, A sent a check to Y's address. Unknown to A, Y had died before X, and the legacy had lapsed. B, Y's administrator, indorsed the check and paid the proceeds to Y's next of kin. A was allowed to recover from B.¹³ But no valid waiver or ratification can be made unless it is shown that the party alleged to have ratified was then aware of the mistake.¹⁴

It is often said that mistake must be mutual, which seems to mean that both parties must make the same mistake, or one must make it and the other must know and take advantage of it. Like many other general propositions concerning mistake, this does not prove a satisfactory guide on analysis. Of the mistakes as to an essential feature of the contract, mistake as to the identity of the adversary party can scarcely be conceived of as mutual. As to mistakes concerning the subject-matter, courts differ; some holding that such mistakes must be mutual to be operative;¹ others that they need not be.² Mistake as to the terms of a contract cannot be mutual, yet it often is operative.³ Mistake in the inducement is not usually operative; hence the necessity of its being mutual need not be considered.⁴ Mistake in expression, to be operative as such must be mutual.⁵ The term "mutual" in this sense has a peculiar meaning.⁶ Doubtless the rule originated in this class of mistake, and its agent; in which case A can avoid the contract; or is not, in which case A cannot. McKinnon v. Vollmar, 75 Wis. 82; 17 Am. St. Rep. 178; 6 L. R. A. 121; 43 N. W. 800; (obiter) Law v. Grant, 37 Wis. 548.

application to other classes is partly due to a loose and indiscriminating statement of such rule as a general proposition. Payment by mistake of fact has the same effect whether the mistake is mutual or not.⁷

IV. NON-DISCLOSURE.

§85. Non-disclosure as to essential element of contract.

If A is mistaken as to an essential element of a contract, and B, the adversary party, knows of such mistake and does not correct it, no contract exists.¹ So if A, an insurance company, pays a claim to B, the insured, for the loss of B's property by reason of the negligence of X, a railway company, and B does not disclose to A that he has settled with X, thereby defeating A's right of subrogation, A can recover the payment.² So if tenants who are to pay a less rent than the regular rate if a lower rate is charged for the adjoining premises, pay the regular rate because the lessor does not disclose that he has made a reduction in the rent of such adjoining premises, they may recover such excess.³ Examples of such non-disclosure have been given under mistake.⁴ Non-disclosure of this type is a peculiar form of mistake. It differs from pure mistake chiefly in this: that while in pure mistake no relief can be given ordinarily where one party has by mistake expressed his intention in terms differing from those intended;⁵ a different rule applies where the adversary party knew of such mistake and did not disclose it.

If the offeree knows that the terms of the offer do not express the real intention of the offerer, and the offeree seeks to take advantage of such mistake by accepting the offer, no contract exists.¹ Thus if a telegram, as transmitted, shows on its face that some error has been made, the offeree cannot accept and bind the offerer; nor can he hold the telegraph company liable.² Thus an offer by telegraph as received was so worded as to imply that the price of certain oranges was one dollar and sixty cents; but the party receiving it knew that it meant two dollars and sixty cents. It was held that he could not accept such offer and bind the sender; and that accordingly if the sender accepted the price of one dollar and sixty cents he could not throw the loss on the telegraph company.³ So A offered to sell bolting cloth to B at "five cents a yard that (another vendor) would charge you." The word, "less," was omitted, and "that" was written in place of "than." B knew that such mistake had been made, but tried to bind A, by accepting the offer, to sell the cloth at five cents a yard. It was held that no binding contract existed.⁴ A made a written offer to a city to construct a public work. By a clerical mistake of A's engineer, certain items were bid at too low a price, in one instance the bid being one dollar and fifty cents a cubic yard for work fairly worth fifteen dollars a cubic yard, which was the bid intended. The city knew of such mistake, and attempted to accept the offer as written. Before such acceptance, A notified the city of the mistake and demanded that the bid be corrected, or that it be withdrawn. It was held that no contract was created by such attempted acceptance.⁵ Even after performance, the party making such mistake is not bound by the contract, but may recover a reasonable compensation.⁶ The same principle applies if the offerer knows that the offeree misunderstands the terms of the offer, and allows the offeree to accept under such mistake.⁷ So in written contracts, if by fair construction, the intention of the party thus misled can be given effect, such effect will be given to it.⁸ But if the contract is in writing and unambiguous, the parole evidence rule⁹ prevents relief from being given to the party misled, unless circumstances of fraud and the like intervene. In some jurisdictions, negligence of the mistaken party has a different effect in non-disclosure of this type from that which it has in pure mistake. If A is mistaken as to the contents of a written contract through failure to pay attention to it when read, and B knows of A's mistake, A's negligence does not prevent him from obtaining relief.¹⁰ Where differing from pure mistake, non-disclosure of this type has legal effects like fraud.¹¹

FRAUD IN THE INDUCEMENT.

I. NATURE OF FRAUD.

§87. False representation.

Fraud in the inducement exists where the defrauded party understands the identity of the adversary party, the consideration, the subject-matter, and the terms of the contract; and he is willing to enter into the contract in question; but his willingness so to enter is caused by a fraudulent misrepresentation of the adversary party as to a material fact. What a false representation is, is a question involving in part some elements elsewhere discussed.¹ Unless a false representation is made fraud cannot exist.² Where there is no false representation, "earnest solicitation" cannot amount to fraud.³ The mere fact that a contract is an unwise or a foolish one does not establish the existence of fraud.⁴

The form in which such representation is made is immaterial.¹ It may consist of actual false statements,² of statements partly true, but so framed as to mislead,³ or of either words or conduct which prevent the adversary party from discovering the truth.⁴ Non-disclosure, as distinguished from active concealment is discussed subsequently.⁵

§89. Fraud committed by acts.

Fraud may be committed as well by acts as by express words.¹ Many of the cases illustrating this principle are also examples of active concealment.² Any conduct intended to deceive may be fraud if the other necessary elements are present; as giving a check on a bank in which the drawer has no funds.³

§90. Active concealment.

Active concealment of material facts, as distinguished from innocent non-disclosure, amounts to fraud.¹ Thus fraud was held to exist where a judgment of over seven thousand dollars was bought for four hundred dollars, the vendee not disclosing that the judgment debtor was dead, leaving an estate worth six thousand dollars,² where a vendor of personalty packed it so as to conceal defects,³ where a vendor of a horse affected with glanders said that it had distemper, a much less serious disease, which explained the apparent symptoms,⁴ or where the vendor hitched his horse short to keep him from "cribbing" and explained it by saying that it was done to keep the horse tion,¹¹ or a disclosure of a defect in an animal, omitting to disclose a similar defect,¹² have each been held to amount to fraud. So where A had agreed to sell realty to B for a cash payment, A to waive his lien for the purchase price and to allow B to borrow a sum of money from X with which B and X had agreed that such realty should be improved, it was held fraud for B and X to omit to disclose to A that the cash payment made by B to A came out of the money loaned by X to B.¹³

Fraud consisting of oral misrepresentations may avoid a contract in writing.¹ The so-called Parol Evidence Rule has no application to extrinsic evidence when used to attack the validity of the contract.²

§93. Fraud affecting contracts within the Statute of Frauds.

Even if the contract is one which by the statute of frauds must be in writing, or some note or memorandum thereof must be in writing, oral misrepresentations if containing the other requisite elements may constitute fraud.¹ This rule is usually invoked when the contract has been performed, and the fraud is treated as a tort.²

§94. Representations as a credit of third person.

A false representation as to the credit, character and the like of a third person is not within that clause of the statute of fraud which refers to contracts "to answer for the debt, default or miscarriage of another," and need not be in writing.¹ The liability contemplated by the statute is one on contract. If any liability is sought to be enforced by reason of false representations, it is one in tort. It is for this reason that the statute does not apply. The result is, in some respects, peculiar. By false oral representation as to B's credit, A may become personally liable; while he would not be personally liable if he had specifically contracted to discharge B's liability if B was unable to do so.² Thus a representation made by an officer of the bank to a depositor with reference to the solvency of the bank may be actionable fraud though not in writing.³

In some states, however, such representations are, by special statute, not actionable unless in writing, if made for the purpose of procuring extension of credit to such third person; and in some States this statute is incorporated into the statute of frauds.⁴ Under the Indiana statute, no action can be maintained to charge a person by reason of any representation made concerning the "character, conduct, credit, ability, trade or dealings of any other person," unless such representation is in writing and signed by the party to be charged thereby or some one legally authorized by him.⁵ Thus an oral representation by the president of a corporation as to its solvency,⁶ or by the agent of a natural person as to his principal's solvency,⁷ is not actionable so as to impose a liability upon the person making such representation.

⁷ Hunter v. Randall, 62 Me. 423;

Such statutes do not apply where the party who makes such false representations does so for his own advantage without procuring the extension of credit to the person whose credit is in question.⁸ Thus an oral representation that a given corporation has paid large dividends, made by a stockholder therein for the purpose of selling his stock is actionable fraud.⁹ So a fraudulent conspiracy between A and X, whereby A misrepresents to B the utility of an alleged patent right owned by X, and A induces B to purchase such patent right by pretending to execute the contract as joint maker with B, is not within the statute.¹⁰ If the personal advantage to accrue to the party making the false representation is to come solely through extension of credit to such third person, the statute applies. Thus where the person making the false representation gains advantage as an officer of a corporation, to which he procures the extension of credit by false representations,¹¹ or as a stockholder, where by fraud he induces a sale of stock by the corporation to a third person,¹² or where he receives a commission for making the contract on behalf of his principal, which he induces by false representations,¹³ the statute applies.

II. REPRESENTATIONS OF FACT.

§95. Material fact — What is fact.

The second question to consider in discussing the elements of fraud is what is a material fact. The false representation must be of a fact as distinguished from statements, such as opinions and promises which are not facts.¹ What representations are representations of fact may be better illustrated by examples than stated as an abstract rule. Thus statements con-

are not statements of facts. Where a statement is merely a conclusion from facts in the knowledge of both parties, it is the opinion of the one expressing it, and even if untrue cannot be fraud.¹ Certain statements, no matter how strongly made, show on their face that they are merely opinions.² A false statement as to when shares in a building and loan association will reach their full value and what the rate of interest will be,³ or a statement as to the amount of surplus that would accrue on an insurance policy;⁴ a statement of the amount unpaid on a bond, where such amount is a matter of calculation from facts known to both parties;⁵ a statement that a bond sold was an "A No. 1 bond" and that "the railroad was good security;"⁶ that a breeding stallion would not beget sorrel colts;⁷ that certain willow-cuttings would live;⁸ a representation as to the quantity of apples that an orchard bore and that it was cheap at the rent;⁹ or that a certain stream would develop a certain horse power,¹⁰ are each merely expressions of opinion. So a statement of opinion as to the possible use of realty for building,¹¹ or the area,¹² or title to realty, the facts being known, from which either party could deduce an opinion,¹³ cannot be fraud. A statement as to the quality of land has been held to be a statement of opinion.¹⁴ Express disclaimer of knowledge by the party making the representation shows that it is an expression of opinion only.¹⁵ A statement which is ordinarily one of fact, such as financial condition, will be merely an opinion where the party states it as a mere matter of opinion or belief;¹⁶ such as a statement that he considers himself worth from ten to twenty thousand dollars clear.¹⁷ Thus a statement of the "estimated" amount of losses unadjusted, in suspense and in litigation, in a statement of an insurance company is a mere matter of opinion.¹⁸ Thus where defendant and plaintiff neither knew nor had means of knowing how many head of cattle defendant had and plaintiff knew all the facts an action for false representations will not lie where defendant agrees to deliver one thousand and delivers only two hundred and fifty.¹⁹

A statement which by itself might be a mere expression of opinion may be so connected with a statement of a material fact as to amount to fraud. A statement of value involving and coupled with a statement of a material fact is fraud.¹ Thus a statement that land is well timbered,² or that it is in a bad location out from the city, where vendee thus induces vendor, whose agent he is, to sell him the land at one-sixth of its value;³ or that a warehouse is "fire proof,"⁴ may each amount to fraud. So a statement as to the value of certain kinds of personal property, such as notes⁵ or bonds⁶ involves a positive statement as to the solvency of the debtor and can be fraud.

So a statement that a certain stock is worth more than par can be fraud under some circumstances.⁷ So a statement as to the value of goods⁸ may be fraud. A specific statement as to one's own financial condition is a fact.⁹ So a statement by a vendee that he is in as good financial condition and has as good credit at the bank as ever may be fraud.¹⁰ So a statement as to amount of annual accumulations on stock,¹¹ or a statement of the number of monthly payments necessary to discharge a building association mortgage,¹² or a statement as to the successful operation of a machine,¹³ or that a machine is well adapted for a certain purpose,¹⁴ are facts. Accordingly, where a statement might in one view of the evidence be an expression of an opinion and in another be a statement involving a fact, it is a question of fact which meaning was intended and understood.¹⁵

⁷ Where the stock was in a corporation apparently formed for legal business, but intended to do an unlawful loan business, under a contract with a bank such that all its assets would ultimately pass over to the bank, a statement by the president of such bank that the stock in such corporation was worth more than par and that it would yield certain dividends was held fraud. *Murray v. The court said, "the loose statement that the business was 'all right' can not be regarded as equivalent to a positive declaration that the corporation was a perfectly solvent and paying concern. Mere 'puffing' does not constitute legal fraud, the same not being calculated to really mislead a purchaser, especially when he is afforded a full opportunity to form his own independent opinion as to the advisability of becoming a purchaser." But a statement concerning future dividends purporting to be based on the present condition and past history of the corporation may be fraud. Beckwith v. Ryan, 66 Conn. 589; 34 Atl. 488.

dividends would be paid;⁴ statements as to the number of fish that would be caught,⁵ as to the future growth of a town,⁶ as to the number of men that would be employed in industries near the land sold,⁷ that a certain person was about to become a partner,⁸ that a corporation would be able to raise certain funds,⁹ or that certain improvements would be made on adjoining land,¹⁰ or that certain articles could be put on the market at a certain price,¹¹ or that the principal debtor would discharge the note and free the surety from all liability,¹² or that a third person would pay a given debt,¹³ are each mere predictions and hence matters of opinion only. the property sold,⁷ a verbal agreement to form a partnership to buy standing timber, unenforceable under the statute of frauds,⁸ a promise not to compete in business,⁹ or not to assign a note,¹⁰ refer solely to the future, and though broken cannot be fraud. that a given contract has been made,⁴ as a representation that a mill and iron foundry has been contracted for⁵ or has not been made,⁶ or a statement that a deed does not contain anything affecting the interest of a given party and that if anything does affect such interest it would be made good⁷ is fraud. If such promise is carried into the contract and is made a term thereof, failure to perform is a breach, and is discussed hereafter.⁸

If the circumstances are such as to create an implied trust, a breach of a contract to carry out such trust is often called fraud in equity.¹ In such cases, however, the fraud is really the failure to carry out the trust, a duty existing independent of contract, and not the breach of the contract. Thus where property is conveyed by one to another in whom he reposes trust and confidence, as by son to mother,² mother to son,³ husband to wife,⁴ wife to husband,⁵ or to any person in whom actual trust and confidence is reposed,⁶ for the purpose of carrying out a trust, equity will enforce a contract to carry out such trust. This question is affected by the Statute of Frauds.⁷

§102. Promise made without intention of keeping it.

Where the promise is made without any intent on promisor's part to keep it, but to induce action on the part of promisee, it is held in many jurisdictions to be fraud,¹ on the theory that the intent of the party promising is a material fact.² Thus, where a wife induces her husband to convey property to her, meaning to abandon him when the conveyance is delivered,³ where A induces B to buy and pay for certain property by having C promise B to buy it from him at an advance;⁴ where a promise is made to furnish such proofs of pedigree as will make it possible to register horses sold,⁵ or to reorganize an insolvent corporation,⁶ or to reconvey property on demand,⁷ to make a specified use of the tract sold, thereby increasing the value of the rest of the original tract,⁸ or where A obtains from B an instrument unenforceable between the parties, by promising not to transfer it, but intending to transfer it to a bona fide holder and cut off B's defense,⁹ without intent to keep any of such promises, they were held to be fraud. So a promise by an agent as an inducement to a contract of sale that the principal would advance money to harvest the crop sold, the agent having no reasonable ground of expecting that the principal would make the advance is fraud.¹⁰ So a statement that the principal debtor would use the loan to buy property, when in fact he meant to use it to pay an antecedent debt, is fraud when a surety is thereby induced to sign a note.¹¹ So a representation by the agent of a railroad as to the time which a given trip would take is fraudulent where he knows that owing to an accident on a connecting road such trip cannot be thus made.¹² Some courts, however, hold that a promise was committed by A (a husband) falsely stating to his wife that his brother B would convey to him stock in his business, thereby inducing her to deed her property to B, B intending to convey the property to A. Ilgenfritz v. Ilgenfritz, 116 Mo. 429; 22 S. W. 786.

⁹ A was surety on a constable's bond. B, who claimed damage by reason of misconduct in office, obtained a note from A by representing to him that he did not intend to enforce it, but wished it to show the town that the matter was settled. It was held that this fraud avoided the note even if B had a claim against the town, and the town an action over against A. Wilbur v. Prior, 67 Vt. 508; 32 Atl. 474. Where a married woman was not liable as surety, but was liable as principal inducing a married woman who means to be surety only to sign as co-principal, representing that no liability will be incurred thereon and then transferring to a bona-fide holder, whereby such surety is obliged to pay the note, fraud exists. Jones v. Crawford, 107 Ga. 318; 45 L. R. A. 105; 33 S. E. 51. So where A had the legal title and B the equitable, B was guilty of fraud in assigning his equitable interest and then getting A's heirs to convey to C, who conveyed to bona-fide purchasers. Smith v. Glover, 44 Minn. 260; 46 N. W. 406.

A statement by a creditor of an insolvent street railway as to the improvements which the creditors intended to put on the road, to induce another company to consolidate, is a statement of fact as of an existing intent. *Old Colony Trust Co. v. even when made without the intention of keeping it, cannot be fraud if the damage results solely from non-performance, as the essential feature relied on is the promise, without reference to the intent of the party making it.¹³ Thus a promise by a retail merchant to continue his business and to keep up his trade with a wholesale dealer is not fraudulent, even if he did not intend to keep the promise when he made it, as it is both future and indefinite.¹⁴ Even where a promise made without the intention of keeping it is not treated as fraud where the damage which is suffered results from non-performance, a different rule applies where the damage suffered is not the result of non-performance of the promise.¹⁵ Thus fraud was held to exist where a promise is made with no intention of keeping it, merely to induce promisee to come into the state so that the promisor may have him arrested,¹⁶ as the damage resulted from the arrest and not from the non-performance of the promise.

An application of the doctrine that a promise made without the intention of keeping it may be fraud, is found in purchases of goods on credit. If one buys goods on credit, intending not to pay for them, this is held fraud,¹ distinct from any false representations as to solvency,² though the fraudulent intent is still clearer where there are false statements as to solvency,³ or where vendee conceals the fact that his property is mortgaged,⁴ or where property is concealed from creditors, though vendee is not insolvent.⁵ A like principle applies where deposits are received⁶ or money is borrowed⁷ by an insolvent bank or trust company, rescission being allowed if the money has not been mingled with the general funds of such institution.

In order to constitute fraud this intention must exist when the goods are purchased,⁸ and it must be an intent never to pay for the goods, and not merely an intent not to pay for them at the time specified in the contract.⁹

If at the time that the goods are bought vendee's circumstances are such that he has no reasonable expectation of paying for them, and he buys on credit without disclosing his circumstances, this is held by some courts to be fraud, even if he had no intent of not paying for them, assuming such combination to be possible.¹⁰

Other authorities hold that there can be no fraud in such cases unless there is a definite intention not to pay for the goods purchased, or a false statement as to solvency.¹¹ A compromise by which vendee returned part of the goods sold, and vendor waived his right to replevin the rest for fraud in the contract of sale, where vendee meant to dispose of the goods and put the proceeds beyond the reach of vendor, so as to prevent his recovering the price, may be avoided for fraud.¹² The mere fact that vendee knows that he is insolvent and does not disclose such fact is not fraud, where he has a reasonable expectation of paying for the goods purchased;¹³ still less where

III. MATERIALITY.

To constitute fraud the representation must be material.¹ What representations are material is a question of law;² and it is usually held that these are all representations which substantially affect the extent of the liability assumed, the value and qualities of the subject, or otherwise tend to induce the party to whom they are made, to enter into the contract.³ Many examples of material representations have already been given and need not be repeated.⁴ Other examples are, statements to an insurance company, which is adjusting a loss, that there are no books which show the cost of the property destroyed;⁵ that an insurance company has evidence that assured died by his own hand while of sound mind,⁶ pointing out different land from that conveyed in the deed,⁷ or misstating its locateen feet,³³ have all been held not to be fraud, even if knowingly false, as immaterial.

IV. FALSITY.

To constitute fraud, the representation must be false when made.¹ This is so obvious that the question is rarely considered specifically. Its chief importance is in cases where the representation is substantially true though literally false, where it is held that fraud does not exist.² Thus a representation that a house is located on the best residence street in town, which is true, although that part of the street is not as good as other parts;³ that a secret process is to be used, even though it has been patented and the patent has expired, if it is unknown to the public;⁴ that A has authorized B to secure C's signature, though false, if made in A's presence as A is estopped to deny such authority;⁵ or that a lease has been extended, if such extension has been agreed on, and is afterward made;⁶ or that certain bicycles were completed and set aside for the vendee, when in fact the frames were set aside and the parts ready to assemble on receiving instructions from vendee as to tires and sprocket wheels,⁷ are not fraud, as they are substantially true. So it is not fraud to capitalize at five million dollars though the property owned was bought for one hundred thousand dollars; when it was sold in ignorance of large deposits of coal from which a profit exceeding five million dollars might reasonably be expected.⁸ If the statement is true, no fraud exists, even though the party making the statement believes that it is false.⁹ Accordingly a statement intended by the party making it to be false but which works an estoppel has been held by some courts not to amount to fraud.¹⁰ Thus since subscribers on condition who hold themselves out to subsequent subscribers as having subscribed unconditionally are estopped to deny it, such representation cannot be fraud.¹¹ So while employing "puffers" to bid at an auction is of itself a fraud on the bidder,¹² still no fraud exists if the puffer would be liable personally on his bid, even if third parties who have hired him have agreed to take over the land bid in by him.¹³ Some authorities, however, differ from this view on the ground that the defrauded party may rescind on discovering the falsity and should not be compelled to take the chances of litigation over the falsity of such statements at a future time. Thus where A, an illiterate woman, was induced by the false representations of an agent to insure her husband's life without his knowledge, which under the rules of the insurance company avoided the insurance, she was allowed to rescind and recover the premiums paid in, although the company would have been bound by the representations of its agent.¹⁴ On the other hand, a statement literally true may constitute fraud if substantially false.¹⁵ Thus where A sold B stock in a corporation representing that the report of the secretary of the corporation showed a certain monthly profit, fraud existed though such a report had been made if it was false and A knew it.¹⁶ If certain material statements are false, the fact that they are coupled with some truthful statements does not prevent fraud from existing.¹⁷ Thus fraudulent statements that certain bonds were marketable and were adequate security for the money paid therefor are not proved true by the fact that interest was paid promptly on such bonds for several years.¹⁸ A statement made to be acted on at a future time may be fraudulent if false when acted on though true when made.¹⁹ Thus a representation to induce the purchase of a lot, that it is unencumbered, is fraudulent if false when the sale is consummated, though true when the statement is made.²⁰

V. KNOWLEDGE OF FALSITY.

§108. Knowledge of falsity.

It is an essential element of fraud as distinguished from misrepresentation,¹ that the party making such statement must do so knowing that it is false;² or that he must make a positive statement as of an existing fact without any reasonable ground for believing it to be true, in reckless ignorance of its truth or falsity.³ Some courts in treating of fraud as an actionable wrong — a tort — for which damages are claimed, hold that a statement in ignorance of its truth or falsity cannot be fraud;⁴ though this is contrary to the weight of authority,⁵ but where the statement is made by the adversary party to the contract, and possesses the other elements of fraud, rescission is always granted, either informally at law or formally in equity.⁶ If the party making such representations knows that they are false, it makes no difference how he obtained his knowledge.

A stated to B that a certain specific lot of ore was within the boundaries of the mine to be sold, when A believed that he was telling the truth, but knew that the truth of the statement depended on the unwarranted assumption that a certain line assumed by the surveyor to run north did in fact run north, fraud was held to exist as such line did not run north and therefore such lot of ore was outside the tract conveyed.³ So the statement by a bank that the capital of an insurance company has been paid in,⁴ or a statement by a creditor that a certain debt has not been paid made to induce the guarantor to pay it,⁵ may each be fraudulent if made positively though believed when made to be true. That the party making the representations can show that he was himself deceived by another,⁶ or was misled by a forged letter from which he obtained his information,⁷ is no defense, as he has expressly or impliedly represented that he had personal knowledge of the fact stated. So one who knows facts from which a reasonable man could infer the falsity of the statement which he makes is held as guilty of fraud as if he had actual knowledge.⁴ Rescission in equity may be had in such cases.⁵ However, in tort some courts hold that no liability exists if there is no active, conscious and intentional fraud.⁶ Some jurisdictions treat fraud in such cases as merely a prima facie inference which may be rebutted by showing good faith.⁷

§111. Statement on authority disclosed.

Fraud is not committed by one who innocently makes a false statement if he makes it not as of his own knowledge, but on curacy and not only to abstain from stating as facts that which is not so but to omit no fact within their knowledge, the existence of which might affect the advantages held out as inducements to take shares. Such officers will be presumed to have known that which it was their duty to know. authority which he then discloses.¹ If, however, he knows the statement to be false, his stating it on the authority of others does not prevent it from constituting fraud.²

Whatever may be its effect as a misrepresentation,³ a false statement made on reasonable ground of belief is not fraud if made innocently, at least if the party making does not make it as of his personal knowledge.⁴ Thus misstatement of ownership in land in good faith is not fraud,⁵ such as a representation as to the title to land made in honest reliance on the certificate of the town clerk and the advice of counsel;⁶ nor is it fraud to omit from a list of debts a claim in litigation on advice of counsel that such claim is unenforceable.⁷

mation which he discloses.⁸ Thus rescission is refused for a false statement as to earnings of another company, with which consolidation of the company whose stock is for sale, is expected, made in good faith and based on data furnished by such company accessible to both parties and believed to be true.⁹

VI. INTENT TO DECEIVE.

Intent to deceive is often said to be an element of actual fraud.¹ If this form of statement is used, it must be noted that, though it may seem to involve an intent to do wrong, it does not necessarily involve such intent.² If the statement has the elements of fraud hitherto discussed, it is sufficient if the party making it intends it to be believed, and action in reliance thereon to be taken.³ Thus if he knows that the statement is false, but believes that it will come true hereafter he is guilty of fraud.⁴ So, fraud exists where one intentionally misrepresents his financial condition in buying goods on credit, though he believes he will be able to pay for them.⁵

Where the party making the statement does not know that it is false, but is bound to know the fact in question, fraud exists

even if he does not intend to deceive.⁶ However, a false statement made casually and at a time previous to the contract and in no way connected with it, is not intended to deceive, so as to make such subsequent contract voidable.⁷ If a false statement of a material fact is made knowingly to the adversary party to the contract, it is almost impossible to escape the inference that intent to induce action existed so as to constitute fraudulent intent.⁸ Since constructive fraud, so-called, often consists of mere non-disclosure,⁹ intent to deceive, as the term is ordinarily used, is not a necessary element thereof, though often present.

§113. Statement not made to party deceived.

Where the statement is not made directly to the person who acts thereon, a question of greater difficulty arises. As a general proposition it may be said that unless the person making the false statement intends to induce action on the part of the person who in fact acts thereon, fraud does not exist.¹ Generally, if A makes a false statement to C, B's agent, to induce B to act thereon, this is fraud if it would be fraud had A made the statement to B in person.² Thus a corporation may maintain an action for fraudulent representations made to its promoters to induce them to organize the corporation.³ This rule is not always applicable. If C knows the truth and A and C are not conspiring to defraud B, B is charged with C's knowledge.⁴ Thus where C asked A to insert in a written contract of sale a higher price than the real one, representing that B wished it, A is not liable to B though C makes use of such contract to mislead B into believing that such price was paid.⁵ If they are so conspiring B may avoid the contract.⁶ If A makes a fraudulent statement to B and B innocently repeats it to C, A's liability to C depends on whether A intended or should have contemplated A's communicating such offer to C. If so intended, A is liable.⁷ If A did not so intend, as where A defrauds B in some transaction and B conveys his rights to C repeating A's representations, A is not liable to C.⁸ So in cases where a corporation has been required to file sworn statements of its condition as a condition precedent to incorporation or to doing business in a foreign state, it is held that such statements are filed solely for that purpose and not being intended to induce action on the part of those dealing with the corporation are not fraud.⁹ If A makes a false statement to X in B's presence, intending that B should hear and act upon such statement, A is guilty of fraud toward B.¹⁰

§114. Statement made to deceive public.

A statement made to the public, intended to influence the action of anyone who may be deceived thereby, may amount to fraud.¹ Thus fraud may be committed by issuing a statement or prospectus of the affairs of a corporation, designed to influence the public generally though such report may be required by law,² and such liability exists by force of Common Law principles independent of statute.³ Thus depositors,⁴ a purchaser of stock,⁵ or a surety on the bond of a cashier,⁶ can avail themselves of fraud in such cases. So a statement made in an advertisement of a sale⁷ may be fraud.

Fraud may be committed by making false statements to a commercial agency for communication to those applying for information,¹ or by referring others to an agency for a report, where, though such person made no false statement of his financial condition to the agency, he knows that the agency rates him too high.² But an erroneous report of an agency cannot be considered the fraud of one who neither made the representations on which such report is based, nor gave such agency as his reference.³ The omission of a corporation to change its statement made to a financial agency is not fraud as to one who without the knowledge of such corporation relies on the statement of such agency.⁴

therefore, be one in which reliance is possible.² If, in fact, action is taken in reliance solely upon the representations, fraud exists although the party to whom such representations were made testifies, "I could not believe him, for I did not know."³

If the party who claims to have been misled acted when he did not know that such false statement had been made,⁴ as where he acts before the representation has been made,⁵ or if knowing that the statements have been made he does not rely on them, but by contract he makes his liability contingent on the truth of such statements,⁶ or if he disbelieves the statements,⁷ or relies solely on some collateral inducement, such as a guaranty,⁸ or knows iar therewith²⁰ cannot be fraud. So one who knows that the only supply of water is from a cistern cannot avoid a lease for fraud when the water becomes impure for want of rain, though the landlord represented the water supply as excellent.²¹

One to whom false statements are made and who believes them in spite of information to the contrary received from others, may in law be justified in relying thereon and may hold the party making such statements liable for fraud.²² Thus where A represented to a woman that he was unmarried, and though others informed her that he was married, she believed A, she can hold A for such fraud,²³ and so where A sells B stock representing that he is only a stockholder and not a promoter, though B has heard rumors that A had a greater interest than he admitted.²⁴ So knowledge of the falsity of one representation is not notice of the falsity of another.²⁵ So notice of the facts to one not an authorized agent of the adversary party does not prevent a positive false statement as to the title to realty from amounting to fraud, such notice not being communicated to such adversary party.²⁶ So a declaration by A at the outset of negotiations of his ignorance of a certain fact does not prevent a subsequent positive false statement as to such fact from amounting to fraud.²⁷ Whether a fraudulent representation as to title to land can be said to be relied on where a deed is taken with covenants of warranty is a question on which the courts are divided. A majority hold that such representations are not merged in the warranty, but may be fraud;²⁸ a minority holding that they are merged.²⁹

A provision in a contract that it is subject to an investigation by the purchaser of the land purchased does not prevent false representations from amounting to fraud.³⁰

§118. Necessity of sole reliance on false statement.

If the false representation was material and influenced the party to whom it was made, it may constitute fraud although the party acted as he did from several motives of which this was but one;¹ as where vendee buys, relying on the false statements of the vendor, but influenced in part by information from other sources.²

Some courts hold that the party deceived must show that he would not have acted as he did but for the false representation to establish fraud.³ So where one acts on the report of a commercial agency which is based in part on false statements of vendee and in part on independent investigation, some courts hold that this cannot be fraud.⁴ This view is unsound in principle and if carried to its logical limit would practically destroy the doctrine of fraud, since in almost every case the defrauded party relies in part on some knowledge outside of the false statements,⁵ and some jurisdictions which have entertained it seem to have abandoned it.⁶ Of the cases cited, some can be explained on other grounds, as where the report of the agency advised the party asking for it that the statement in question was incorrect,⁷ or where the report was not based on the statement.⁸ A change made by the agency correcting an error in addition is not such an independent report as to prevent the false statement thus forwarded from being fraud.⁹

§119. Duty of making further investigation.

If the person to whom the false statements are made could, by such further investigation for himself as a prudent man would make, discover their falsity, he is negligent to some extent if he omits to investigate. Whether the party making such false statements can avoid liability by showing that it was negligence to believe them, is a different question. The weight of modern authority is that this is no defense: indeed, the greater reliance, the clearer case of fraud, as long as the representations were not false on their face or known to be false.¹ Thus fraud may exist although the party deceived might by investigation have discovreport for which there is no pretense that (the party making the false statements) was responsible." Poska v. Stearns, 56 Neb. 541; 71 Am. St. Rep. 688; 42 L. R. A. 427; 76 N. W. 1078.

incumbrances,¹⁰ or taxes,¹¹ or tax-titles,¹² or though it appears on an abstract of title,¹³ or records of the patent office,¹⁴ fraud exists if such false statements were in fact relied on. Where A makes certain representations to B and refers him to other sources of information and advises him to consult them, it is a question of fact whether B should consult such sources.¹⁵

§120. Investigation held necessary.—Comparison of doctrines.

There are, however, many cases, some of them decided recently, in which the courts hold that where the facts are equally accessible to both parties, public policy demands that the law should require persons to whom representations are made to use all reasonable means for determining their truth, and that failure to investigate may amount to inexcusable negligence and may preclude the negligent party from obtaining relief.¹

A comparison and analysis of the two apparently conflicting lines of cases shows that there is little conflict in the actual decisions though there is absolute conflict in the dicta. In many of the cases the real holding was that the parties had not equal means of knowledge.² Discussion of what would have been the result had they had equal means of information is therefore in the nature of an obiter. In others, the statement was rather in the nature of an opinion, for instance, as to the value of property,³ or of the legal effect of transactions known to both parties, as where a husband claimed that all property acquired under circumstances known to his wife was his sole property,⁴ or where A claimed that B's mortgage had been foreclosed, though the receipt which B had was a notice of facts which showed that no valid decree could have been taken;⁵ where the means of knowledge possessed by the party defrauded is important only as showing that the statement was an opinion, and not a fact.⁶

Many of the cases are really decided on other grounds, such as absence of knowledge of falsity, ratification, and the like. In other cases the very transaction brought such facts to the notice of the party alleging fraud as advised him of the falsity of the representations,⁷ such as the quality of the soil, the timber or the existence of springs,⁸ or the nature of a channel to be dredged.⁹ After eliminating all these cases, however, a number are left where representations which otherwise would be fraud, are held not to be so because the party deceived had the means of determining the facts but negligently omitted to use them.¹⁰ This rule has been applied to false statements as to price paid for stock,¹¹ as to the amount of sales and profits of a business made to one familiar with the business, who has examined it carefully and who refused an opportunity to examine the books,¹² as to land titles,¹³ or that there has been no trouble over a right of way,¹⁴ in each of which cases relief against fraud was refused on the ground of negligence of the defrauded party. Almost all the decisions, as distinguished from the reasons given in the opinions of the courts, may be harmonized by stating the rule in this form. A person is charged with notice of facts actually brought to his attention in the transaction, though he may fail to grasp their full import and all the consequences that flow from them. On mere opinions he has in ordinary cases no right to rely, but he must investigate for himself. But if facts are stated positively, he is not bound to make further investigation though he must avail himself of the knowledge actually brought to his notice with whatever is implied therefrom.¹⁵ Where fraud is invoked to avoid contract liability the weight of authority is that while the defrauded party must make use of his senses and his reason, and must take cognizance of what is actually brought to his notice, he need not make further investigation. The greater number of cases in which investigation has been held necessary are those in which the fraud has been used as the basis of the action of deceit.

§121. Right to rely where means of knowledge not equal.

Even the courts which adhere most rigidly to the rule that if the means of knowledge are equal, the party deceived is bound to use such means, recognize a class of cases which they refuse to define exactly, preferring to say that each separate case rests on its own facts and circumstances,¹ in which the means of knowledge are not equal, and in which the defrauded party is therefore excused from investigating. Thus where investigation is difficult,² as where the false statement is as to rock or minerals underlying land,³ as where a statement is made as to the result of submarine soundings and as to the thickness of rock to be removed,⁴ or where the bottom of pits filled with water was said to show ore,⁵ or where statements are made as to underground supply pipes,⁶ or where the property in question is at some distance so that further research is necessary to ascertain the falsity of the statement,⁷ or where a vendor of a stock of goods so located that the vendee cannot inspect them represents that it is a mentally deficient,³ or understands English imperfectly,⁴ the person reposing trust and confidence has a right to rely upon the positive statements of the other without further investigation. This, however, is a doctrine of constructive fraud,⁵ and might be invoked in cases where no actual fraud could be shown to exist.

If the person to whom the false statements are made does not rely on them, but investigates for himself and acts in reliance on his own knowledge, no fraud exists if the falsity of such representations was or could be discovered thereby and if no artifice was resorted to to prevent him from discovering the truth.¹

a mill,⁵ the stock of goods in a saloon,⁶ the quality of personal property,⁷ or the solvency of a person,⁸ relies not on such statement but on the result of his independent inquiries, no fraud can be said to exist.

§124. Effect of partial and unsuccessful investigation.

If a partial investigation is made which from its nature cannot and does not disclose the falsity of the statements made, and the original statement is relied on, as not being contradicted by such investigation, the weight of modern authority is that fraud can exist.¹ Thus a statement that a lot is on a certain unopened street,² or that the dimensions of the tract are of a certain length,³ or that the tract is of a certain area,⁴ or that a certain fence is the boundary,⁵ or that a certain well never went dry,⁶ or that a machine could perform certain work,⁷ may be fraud, though actual view of the premises in question was had, but did not reveal the falsity of the statement. An inquiry as to vendee's solvency made of persons who obtain their knowledge solely from vendee,⁸ is not such independent investigation as to prevent a false statement as to solvency from being fraud. So misrepresentation and the use of unfamiliar technical words may be fraud leading the purchaser to believe that he is to get an "artist-proof edition" even if he sees samples;⁹ or a false statement by A that a judgment against B has been assigned to him, though B examines the record and no assignment appears there.¹⁰

§125. Effect of investigation defeated by fraud.

If the party who makes the false representations prevents such investigation as would disclose the falsity of such statements by means of further deceit, a partial examination, or a total omission to make an examination, does not prevent fraud from existing.¹ Thus A's making false statements to B as to the quantity of timber on certain land, and A's agent showing B a part of the land on which the timber was much better than on the rest and assured B that this was a fair average;² or point-

VIII. ^{*}DAMAGE.

§126. Damage a necessary element of fraud.

To constitute fraud the party deceived must act in reliance upon such false representations to his damage.¹ Illustrations of action which does not result in damage and in which case therefore fraud does not exist, are employing false representations to induce one to do a legal duty,² as to secure his own debt,³ or to pay his own debt,⁴ inducing one to sell his property for its full value,⁵ or inducing all the stockholders to surrender to the corporation an equal percentage of their holdings,⁶ misrepresenting the estate conveyed as a fee when it is possibly a life estate, but all the remaindermen are bound by the judgment of the court that it is a fee,⁷ or inducing one who has a right to renounce a contract for any reason he sees fit, to renounce it.⁸ So a life insurance company cannot defend in an action by an examiner for examination fees on the ground that applicants were induced to apply by the representation of a director that such applications would be for the benefit of such director and the examiner.⁹ So where even if the facts as represented were true, no advantage could result therefrom to the party to whom they were made, and he has the same legal rights whether they are false or true, fraud does not exist.¹⁰ Thus allegations that A, the owner of the fee in a tract of land and X conspired to defraud B, and that X represented that he had leased the tract for a term of years, had paid a year's rent, and that on completion thereon by X of buildings to cost seventy-five thousand dollars, A was to pay X twenty-five thousand dollars, no part of which was to go to pay for the buildings or to pay contractors, and that by reason of such representations B was induced to make a contract with X for the erection of buildings to cost about sixty-eight thousand dollars, and that under such contract B had done certain work of a certain value which had not been paid, does not state a case of fraud.¹¹ induced to enter into it by fraud. So fraudulently inducing a conveyance of an entire tract by one occupying only a small part thereof gives no right of action in equity to the real owner of such tract to have such deed cancelled as it has no effect on his rights.² So an oral promise, though made without the intention of performing, if made prior to the execution of an inconsistent written contract on the same subject, cannot be enforced because of the parol evidence rule,³ and is not fraud.⁴

The cases already given are for the most part actions at law for deceit. It seems clear on principle that one who wishes to recover damages must show damages. Whether the same rule applies where rescission is sought in equity or is effected informally at law by an action to recover the property parted with is not so clear. In some cases rescission is refused where no actual damage exists,¹ as inducing purchase of coal land by false statements as to the output where the land is as valuable as represented.²

This rule cannot be sustained on sound principle. To hold that one must accept a legal right different from that promised him because it is as valuable in money is to ignore a fundamental principle of contract law. Accordingly, many courts hold that false representation made knowingly with intent to deceive, causing deception and thereby inducing one to make a contract that he would not otherwise have made, are grounds for rescission though no actual damage follows.³ Where one does not, by reason of fraud, obtain a legal right which he is promised, as where a different tract of land is pointed out from that conveyed,⁴ or where a remedy such as foreclosure is lost by such fraud, though the mortgagor is solvent,⁵ rescission may be had without showing any pecuniary loss. Equity will not give specific performance of a contract to one who has been guilty of false representations.⁶

Informal rescission for fraud has been allowed at law though no injury is shown to have resulted therefrom.⁷ Thus where A induced B to buy certain stock food by falsely stating that B's brother had recommended its purchase, and B gave his note therefor, B was allowed to avoid liability to A on the note by disaffirming the contract and refusing to accept the food.⁸ So in the meaning of this rule damage exists where there is a false statement as to the amount of a mortgage on the property conveyed, though the grantee did not assume it and the mortgagor is personally liable on the mortgage debt,⁹ or where there is a false statement as to who is surety on a bond, though the party defrauded may have so acted as to release all sureties on such bond,¹⁰ or where a person is induced to make a new mortgage when other security for such debt is released, throwing a greater burden on the land,¹¹ or where a woman is deceived by a representation of A that he is unmarried, by which she is induced to marry him.¹²

IX. PARTY MAKING FALSE STATEMENT.

To constitute fraud, the false representation must be made by the party held liable therefor or his agent. A false statement made by a third person cannot be treated as the fraud of a party to the contract who is ultimately benefited thereby if he did not know that such false statement had been made, and was relied on by the adversary party, if the party who made the false representation is not the agent of such party to the contract. The party innocent of the fraud is not liable for damages nor can the contract be rescinded,¹ unless it is void under the doctrines of mistake. Accordingly if a person desiring insurance makes a truthful statement to the agent of the insurance company, and such agent, without the knowledge of the insured, forwards a false statement of facts to the company on which a policy issued, such false statement is not the fraud of the insured.² Thus a vendee cannot be held guilty of fraud on account of false statements sent out by mercantile agencies, unless it can be shown that he made the statement to the agency.³ Thus where A agreed with B to convey realty to such person as B should designate, and B designates C, B's fraud does not affect C's rights,⁴ nor where A by fraud induces B to act as surety for him to C, can A's fraud be a defense to B against C,⁵ nor where A by fraud induces B to join with him in contracting with C,⁶ nor where A by fraud induces B to sell goods to C.⁷ Thus where A sold goods to B by fraudulent representations and C acquires A's interests in ignorance of the fraud and made a new contract with B, A's fraud cannot be imputed to C.⁸ But a grantee who assumes certain claims on the land may interpose the defense of his grantor's fraud on grantee, when sued by the holder of such claims, no transfer of them having been made since grantee acquired the land.⁹ If a stockholder in a corporation is induced to take stock by fraudulent representations of the officers of the corporation he cannot avoid his double liability to creditors of the corporation whose claims have arisen after he acquired his stock.¹⁰ But where he repudiates his subscription promptly he has been allowed to defend against an action to recover his subscription for the benefit of the creditors of the corporation.¹¹

ity,³ or knowingly aids in the commission of the fraud,⁴ or refers the party defrauded to the person making the false statement for information,⁵ he is liable as though he had made the representation in person.

The principal may be liable for fraud though the agent is innocent, as where he authorizes the agent to make a statement but suppresses information which results in a false statement by the agent, contrary to the information possessed by the principal.⁶ Questions as to whom a fraudulent representation can be made are discussed elsewhere.⁷

X. REMEDIES FOR FRAUD.

§131. Election of remedies for fraud.

Fraud in the inducement affects the validity of the offer and acceptance which form the contract. It is also a tort. The injured party has a choice of the following remedies: (1) an action of deceit in tort; (2) in proper cases an informal rescission of the contract at law and a recovery of what he has parted with thereunder; (3) in proper cases a formal decree of rescission or cancellation in equity and a recovery of what he has parted with thereunder; (4) a defense against the enforcement of his executory promise induced by fraud. The election of one of these remedies is a waiver of others, resting upon inconsistent theories of the transaction.¹ Thus where the fraud is committed by the adversary party to the contract, the injured party may elect between his right to avoid the contract, and his right to affirm it and to sue in tort in the action of deceit,² and the election of either remedy,³ as suing for the purchase price after discovery,⁴ or suing on the contract after discovery of the fraud,⁵ bars the other. If, however, after rescission by the defrauded party, the party guilty of fraud refuses to return the property received by him, he may be considered as having converted it to his own use and be held for its value.⁶

Where the fraud is committed by a third person, rescission does not bar a right of action if the defrauded party is not placed in statu quo thereby.⁷ Commencing an action for deceit does not waive the right to rescind in equity.⁸

It is the defrauded party and not the party making the false statements that has this right of election.⁹ Hence the offer of the party guilty of fraud to place the other in the same position that he would have had if the representation had been true does not bar the right of the defrauded party to rescind and recover what he has parted with,¹⁰ nor does the offer to rescind bar him from retaining the property conveyed to him and suing in damages.¹¹ If before rescission the defrauded party is placed in the condition that he would have been in had the representation been true, no damage exists and hence there is no fraud.¹²

Separate fraudulent purchases give rise to distinct causes of action; and an election of a remedy on one cause of action does not bar the election of a different remedy on another cause.¹³ The defrauded party cannot treat the fraudulent representations as terms of the contract. value and the price paid.¹⁰ The party defrauded is thus given the full benefit of his contract, and is placed as nearly as possible in the condition in which he would have been had the representations been true. Since this action is not necessarily connected with contract, it is merely referred to in this connection, to illustrate the different remedies available in case of fraud.

As affecting the validity of the contract, fraud in the inducement renders the contract voidable, not void.¹

In some cases a contract procured by fraud upon a public corporation is void and not voidable. Thus where A, an agent of a corporation selling maps, promised to pay B, a member of a board of education, a sum of money to compensate him for time lost by him in attending a board meeting; and at such meeting maps were purchased from such corporation, B's vote being necessary to carry such resolution, the contract of purchase was held "void," even though no intention on A's part existed to influence B's action.² In cases of this sort, however, the contract is void because the public officers are incompetent to act. Fraud is material only as creating such incompetency.

If executed in whole or in part the defrauded party may rescind informally and sue to recover what he has parted with under the contract,¹ or avoid liability as far as it is executory.² Where fraud induces a sale on credit, the defrauded party may sue at once for the price,³ or may replevin the goods.⁴ If services have been rendered under a special contract induced by fraud, the defrauded party may sue for the reasonable value of such services, less what he has received under the contract. He is not obliged to restore what he has received and sue for the entire amount due as reasonable compensation.⁵ An action of this sort is in quasi-contract.⁶ If a compromise or release is induced by fraud, it may be ignored and recovery may be had on the original cause of action.⁷

A formal decree of rescission is not necessary.⁸ Thus where a release was obtained from A by fraud, it was held that he need not sue in equity to avoid it, but must offer to return the value received therefor and in his suit on the original claim he must have the court declare the release void.⁹

§135. Formal rescission in equity.

Formal decrees of rescission and cancellation may be obtained in equity in cases where no plain, adequate and complete relief can be had at law.¹ Even though the fraud may be a good defense in an action at law on the contract, the defrauded party will not be compelled to wait for litigation at law, but may have rescission in equity.² So the jurisdiction of equity to rescind an ante-nuptial contract for fraud is not ousted by a statute giving concurrent jurisdiction to the probate court.³ Thus executed conveyances,⁴ as a conveyance under seal of a share in an estate,⁵ even when held to be nullities at law, requiring no reconveyances,⁶ fraudulent sales of stock,⁷ written contracts, as a contract to purchase land,⁸ may be avoided by a formal decree in equity.

If the contract is executory as to the liability of the defrauded party, he may avoid liability thereunder, and interpose the defense of fraud in an action brought against him on the contract at law.¹ This is, in one sense, informal rescission, since no decree in equity is necessary. It differs, however, from what is ordinarily termed informal rescission in that the injured party is not seeking to recover what he has parted with under the contract; but is seeking to avoid further liability thereunder.

§137. Duty to place adversary party in statu quo.

In order to rescind, whether informally or by formal decree in equity, the party who commits the fraud must be placed in statu quo by the party seeking relief.¹ The defrauded person, if he has parted with the possession of what he has received under the contract, must regain possession and tender it back,² but if he does this, such sale and repurchase will not prevent rescission.³ The right of being placed in statu quo may be enforced by persons, such as execution creditors, who have acquired liens on the property which the vendor replevins as sold by fraud.⁴ The general rule that the party guilty of fraud must be placed in statu quo is subject to certain qualifications. If the property received by the person defrauded is worthless,⁵ or if its value is trifling,⁶ he need not offer to return it in order to rescind. The party seeking relief need not restore anything not received by him under the contract which he is seeking to avoid.⁷ He need not, of course, restore what he has received under some other contract which he is not seeking to avoid.⁸ If the fraud complained of consists in fraud between the agent of the defrauded party and the party guilty of fraud, the defrauded party need not restore what has been paid to such agent on his own account,⁹ but in such cases the defrauded party must, at least, notify the adversary party of his intention to rescind and give him an opportunity to take control of such property.¹⁰ If there is no fraudulent combination between the party guilty of fraud and the agent of the adversary party, the party seeking relief must tender what has been paid to such agent as commission.¹¹ So he need not tender to the party against whom he seeks relief an amount paid to him by a third party.¹² If the party guilty of fraud is placed in statu quo rescission for such fraud may be granted.¹³ In cases of informal rescission at law the party seeking relief must, as a condition precedent to maintaining his action, place the adversary party in statu quo, or make tender thereof.¹⁴ In a suit for formal rescission in equity it is not a condition precedent to bring the suit that the defrauding party be placed in statu quo. It is sufficient if the defrauded party is ready and willing so to place the adversary party.¹⁵ If the thing received by the defrauded party is surrendered at the trial of the action it is sufficient.¹⁶ The decree of rescission must itself provide for restoration, however, if the defrauding party has not been placed in statu quo before commencement of the suit. The duty to place the party guilty of fraud in statu quo is waived by his refusal to receive it and to return what he has received, and formal tender is thus waived.¹⁷ If the defense of fraud is interposed in an action on an executory contract, it is not necessary as a condition precedent to making such defense to place the adversary party in statu quo.¹⁸

A partial rescission of an entire contract cannot be had. The contract must be valid or void in toto. This rule applies to informal rescission at law, or repudiation of liability under the contract.¹ Where A had exchanged land for stock, by reason of fraudulent representations as to facts affecting its value, he could not affirm the sale, and at the same time enforce a vendor's lien on the realty to the amount of the difference between the actual value of the stock and its value as represented.² If the contract is avoided, it carries with it all clauses, such as provisions for the forfeiture of money deposited.³ Still less can the guilty party demand that the innocent party should rescind only that part of an entire contract to which the fraud specifically related.⁴ The rule that partial rescission or repudiation is impossible applies equally to formal rescission in equity.⁵

This rule does not apply to fraud in some matter collateral to the contract, but not a term thereof. Thus, where A has by fraud been induced to pay an extra sum over and above his actual contract liability he may recover such sum without attacking the original contract.⁶ So if he has been induced to pay money under the contract, by fraudulent representations that the contract has been performed, he may recover such payment without avoiding the contract.⁷ The rule that partial rescission or repudiation is impossible applies only to entire contracts, and not to severable contracts. If the contract is divisible, a part of it may be affirmed and a part disaffirmed.⁸

Since fraud in the inducement makes a contract voidable, not void, the party defrauded may make the contract valid by electing, with full knowledge of the facts, to treat it as valid.¹ Thus a promise to pay the purchase money,² making a partial payment thereon,³ the payment of interest thereon,⁴ an assignment of a mortgage,⁵ the obtaining of an extension of time,⁶ renewing a note,⁷ or making payments thereon,⁸ making a new contract,⁹ or receiving money under the contract,¹⁰ or leasing the property bought through fraud,¹¹ or remaining in possession and making improvements,¹² or taking security for performance,¹³ or treating as his own property received under the contract,¹⁴ or other performance of an executory contract,¹⁵ or bringing suit on the contract,¹⁶ are all acts which amount to a ratification if done after discovery of the fraud and with full knowledge thereof.

The conduct relied on as ratification must be such as unequivocally shows the intention of the defrauded party to be bound by his contract.

Acts which never take effect, as signing and acknowledging a deed of assignment of partnership property, but withdrawing assent before delivery,¹⁷ or acts done under duress, as giving a purchase-money note under duress,¹⁸ are not ratification.

Acts done before the discovery of the fraud cannot constitute ratification.¹⁹ However, acts done after the fraud is discovered, but before the defrauded party has discovered all the evidence tending to prove fraud, may amount to a ratification.²⁰

Notice as an element of ratification must be actual notice. Constructive notice, as is obtained by being a cashier of a bank,²¹ is not the equivalent of knowledge, so as to make acquiescence amount to ratification.

Discovery of one false representation is not constructive notice of the falsity of other representation not yet known to be false.²² If the fraud is discovered during performance, and it is impracticable without great loss to the party guilty of fraud, to stop performance, a continuance of performance is not a ratification.²³ Thus A agreed to drive logs for B, and B fraudulently represented that they did not exceed a certain number. After the logs were in the river and the drive was in progress, A discovered that they greatly exceeded such number. It was held that his completing performance did not waive his right to recover for the excess amount.²⁴

Ratification prevents subsequent rescission, but on principle it should not waive the right of action for damages; and some authorities so hold, on the ground that the action of deceit necessarily presumes that the contract is affirmed.²⁵ Some authorities, however, treat ratification as waiving the right of action for damages.²⁶ Thus possession of leased premises for over a year, asking reduction in rent and time to pay rent overdue without making any claim for damages waives such claim.²⁷

If it is impracticable to place the adversary party in statu quo, as where a vendee of an electric-light plant retains certain defective parts after he learns that the representations as to their condition were false, where it was practically impossible to make tender of such defective parts,²⁸ ratification does not bar the right to recover damages.

Delay for an unreasonable time after the discovery of the fraud, may, without positive acts of ratification amount to a waiver of the right to rescind.¹ Thus, in equity, delay for such lengths of time as eight years,² or three years³ may waive the right to rescind.

The party defrauded has, however, a reasonable time in which to determine whether or not he will avoid the contract, after he discovers the fraud.⁴ Thus, accepting money on the contract three days after an offer to rescind,⁵ or two months' delay in rescinding,⁶ do not amount to ratification. Mere delay in discovering fraud does not prevent disaffirmance.⁷

Laches whereby the party guilty of fraud is given an opportunity to effect his fraud is no bar to an action against the guilty party. Thus omission for five years to record a conveyance, giving the grantor an opportunity to record a mortgage on the realty thus conveyed, in favor of a third party, does not bar an action against such grantor therefor.⁸

§141. Equitable relief refused to party equally guilty.

If the parties to a transaction have each tried to defraud the other, equity will not give relief to the less successful party, but will leave him to his rights at law.¹ This principle applies where the party seeking relief has been guilty of constructive fraud, as where a member of a firm forces a sale to himself of the entire partnership business by buying a rival business, hiring the valuable employees of his old firm secretly and threatening dissolution.²

MISREPRESENTATION IN THE INDUCEMENT.

I. NATURE.

§142. Misrepresentation must be of fact.

To constitute misrepresentation, the statement must be one of fact. If it is clearly on its face a mere matter of opinion or of hearsay, or the statement is avowedly made on the authority of others, misrepresentation cannot exist.¹ Thus a statement in effect of one's opinion as to the value of certain book accounts,² or of certain property,³ or of the location of certain land,⁴ are not misrepresentations. So a prediction is not a misrepresentation.⁵ But where A, while disclaiming any personal knowledge of a material fact, refers to B for information, and B's statements are incorrect, A is in legal effect as liable for such misrepresentation as if he had made it himself.⁶ So in insurance contracts a representation to be operative must be one of fact. A bona fide opinion, even if erroneous, is not mispre-

sentation,⁷ as a mistaken opinion as to the cause of the death of insured's brother professedly given on information derived from others,⁸ or a statement by the examining physician that insured was a "fair" risk, the facts as to his physical condition being given.⁹

To constitute misrepresentation the statement must be false. If substantially true, there is no misrepresentation.¹ Thus where an insured represented that he had not been rejected by any life insurance company, which was true, no misrepresentation existed, though he had been rejected by a beneficial association.²

§144. Representation must mislead.

Further, the party to whom it is made must believe such statement to be true, and must act in reliance on such belief. If the person to whom the representation is made is informed of the facts, no misrepresentation exists.¹ Thus a misrepresentation as to the arrangement of a house, which vendee has inspected,² or as to the execution of a bond, to indemnify against loss on which a second bond is given, where a true copy of the first bond was attached to the second,³ is not operative. So a false statement made after the transaction is entered into cannot be misrepresentation.⁴

So in insurance contracts, to avoid the policy the representation must deceive. If the company can be charged with knowledge of the truth, misrepresentation is not operative.⁵ So a false statement as to the condition of a business is not misrepresentation if the facts in question are shown by the books of the business and the party to whom such representations are made examines such books.⁶ As in cases of fraud, some courts hold that a misrepresentation is not operative if both parties have an equal opportunity to learn the truth.⁷

Wherever misrepresentation is operative, misrepresentation as to a material fact invalidates the contract. In insurance contracts a misrepresentation, even in good faith, of a material fact,¹ such as the interest of the insured in the property covered by the policy,² or in life insurance, the age, if understated,³ or the employment, if more hazardous than stated,⁴ or the habits of the insured as to the use of intoxicating liquors,⁵ avoids a policy of insurance. So a statement in an application for insurance against losses for sales to certain classes of debtors which greatly understates the amount of losses from bad debts during the years before, is material.⁶ So in a contract for the sale of realty a representation by the vendor that the area of the tract is substantially greater than it really is is ground for rescission.⁷

On the other hand, misrepresentation as to an immaterial fact has no legal effect.⁸ Thus where A means to buy nursery stock of B, and C induces A to buy of C by stating that he had taken B's place and sold the same quality of stock as B,⁹ or where a surety signing for the first time is told that the note signed by him is a renewal of a former note of his principal's, when in reality it is for an overdraft,¹⁰ misrepresentation does not exist.

So in insurance, a misrepresentation to be operative must be material to the risk.¹¹ If the representation is of an immaterial matter,¹² as of the coverture of the insured,¹³ or of the fact that all the brothers of insured were alive,¹⁴ the age of the building insured,¹⁵ or its value, where the policy covers only the actual loss,¹⁶ it has no effect on the validity of the policy.

The proposition that damage is a necessary element of misrepresentation means nothing more than this: that the party seeking relief must, by reason of the misrepresentation, have received some right, or incurred some liability substantially different from that so represented to him. Wherever misrepresentation is operative, and rescission is given, it is given although in that case the misrepresentation has not caused any financial loss.¹ Thus if a vendor by mistake points out the wrong land and the vendee relies thereon, he may have rescission, even though the tract conveyed is as valuable as the other.² Thus in insurance policies misrepresentation of a fact material to the risk makes the policy voidable, even though the loss was not due to the fact misrepresented.³

To be operative a misrepresentation must be made by the party against whom relief is sought, or by some one acting on his behalf or to whom he made such representations for the purpose of having them communicated to the party misled. Thus in insurance contracts if the misrepresentation is made by the agent of the insurance company, to the company, intentionally¹ or unintentionally,² it is not misrepresentation by the insured, and does not avoid the policy. Thus no misrepresentation as to age is made where insured states the facts as far as known to the agent of the company and the officers of the company subsequently fill in the blanks.³ If the representation is made by one acting on behalf of the insured, the insured is as liable therefor as if he had made it himself.⁴

If the party making the false representation is not the adversary party to the contract, the case is controlled by the doctrines of mistake and not by those of misrepresentation or fraud. Thus where the principal obligee on a bond misrepresented its contents to the sureties, telling them it was merely a recommendation, they cannot avoid their liability as against the obligee if they had an opportunity to read the contract and he did not know of the misrepresentation.⁵

II. EFFECT.

§148. Original common law rule.— Damages.

At common law, as uninfluenced by equity, the original rule seems to have been that misrepresentation which did not affect the formation of the contract and was not made a term thereof had no effect on its validity, even though it concerned a collateral material fact. The action of deceit could not be brought on an innocent misrepresentation in the great majority of jurisdictions.¹ But this rule, apparently elementary, is departed from in some jurisdictions which allow the action of deceit on innocent misrepresentations if material and causing damage.²

Thus an innocent misrepresentation as to the reliability of a horse, amounting to a warranty,³ or as to the identity of land conveyed where the vendor's agent knew the falsity of his statement, though his principal did not,⁴ or as to the boundaries of land conveyed,⁵ may give rise to an action for damages.⁶ Thus an innocent misstatement by one selling accounts as to what ones are unpaid,⁷ or by a bank director as to the condition of the bank,⁸ may give rise to an action for damages. Where the statement is made positively and as of the knowledge of the party making it, fraud and misrepresentation become almost indistinguishable.⁹ Some courts allow a set-off or recoupment in damages for innocent misrepresentation in an action brought on the contract by the party making such misrepresentations, though they might not allow an original action in tort thereon.¹⁰ Further, if the contract has been assigned by the party who has made the misrepresentations, the adversary party may perform and sue for damages.¹¹ It has been suggested that the true rule is that an innocent misrepresentation gives rise to no liability except when made by one party to the contract, and when it is a means of inducing the adversary party to enter into such contract.¹² This distinction is plausible, and, in part, true. On principle, there should be a difference between these two classes of cases. But the States which recognize a liability at law due to misrepresentation recognize, in some cases at least, a liability of a third person for misrepresentations.¹³

The original common law rule was that an innocent misrepresentation was no ground for repudiating liability on an executory contract nor for informally rescinding a contract during performance or after performance.¹ Thus an executed sale cannot be avoided by the vendor and the goods recovered for an innocent misrepresentation by the vendee as to his solvency;²

nor can the vendee avoid the sale and resist payment of the price for innocent misrepresentations by the vendor.³ Nor can an employee, after receiving injury in an accident, avoid a contract whereby he accepts compensation from a beneficial order of fellow employees and releases the railroad company, on the ground that the railroad company had misrepresented the amount which it had contributed towards the expenses of such society.⁴

§150. Special types of contract.—Insurance.

Even where the rule that innocent misrepresentation does not avoid a contract was most rigidly adhered to at common law, there were two great classes of exceptions thereto: one class of contracts being an exception to this rule on account of the peculiar nature of the subject-matter; the other being an exception on account of the peculiar relations between the parties thereto. Of the first class of contracts, insurance was the most conspicuous example. It was said to be a contract uberrimæ fidei—of superabundant good faith—and one which would be avoided by a material misrepresentation even if innocent. This rule originally applied to marine insurance,¹ but it seems now to be applicable to insurance of all kinds,² such as guaranty insurance,³ fire insurance,⁴ and life insurance.⁵

The common law rule concerning insurance contracts is modified in many jurisdictions by statutes which provide that representations must be wilfully false and fraudulently made to avoid the policy issued thereon.⁶ Under such statutes an innocent misrepresentation does not avoid a policy of insurance issued thereon.⁷ Other statutes provide that the representation will avoid the contract if fraudulent or material.⁸ A statute of the latter type does not probably change the common-law rule as to misrepresentations.⁹ Such provisions, however, do not apply to actual fraud¹⁰ or to conditions precedent.¹¹

1092. A was negotiating with B for the purchase of two lots owned by B. A examined the assessor's books and found the two lots listed and an area in the column therefor. Thinking that this was the area of one lot, he doubled it and represented to B that that product was the area of the two lots, and had it inserted in the contract. The area on the assessor's books was the area of both lots. The court said: "A court of equity has the power to permit a party to rescind a contract entered into in the manner above set forth on the ground of mistake if the other party will not accept performance of the contract omitting the particular stipulation inserted through mistake." from losing his position,¹⁰ or as to the amount due on a bond,¹¹ or as to the amount of debts owing by the vendee who seeks credit,¹² or as to the amount already secured for investment in industrial enterprises in the town in which the land is sold,¹³ are each ground for rescission in equity. So misrepresentation as to the location and quality of land sold¹⁴ is ground for refusing specific performance.

§153. Effect of equity on the common law rule.

The combined effect of the equity rule allowing rescission for a material misrepresentation, and the authority of the common-law courts which treat misrepresentation as fraud, is gradually establishing the doctrine at common law that a misrepresentation of a material fact is ground for an informal rescission at law.¹ Thus an innocent misrepresentation as to the amount of timber on realty conveyed,² or as to the extent of physical injuries,³ or that certain barrels leaked even when properly glued inside,⁴ or as to the existence of insurance on certain property,⁵ or as to the amount⁶ or quality⁷ of articles sold by vendor; or as to the financial condition of a buyer, thereby causing the vendor to extend credit,⁸ or as to the financial condition of a debtor, thereby obtaining an advantageous settlement of his debts,⁹ are each sufficient to enable the party misled thereby to avoid the contract which he is thus induced to make. In many of these cases the reasoning of the court is based on the theory of misrepresentation.¹⁰ "At common law the misrepresentation of a material fact made by one of the parties to a contract, though made by mistake and innocently, if acted on by the opposite party constitutes legal fraud."¹¹ It is said that in order to avoid a contract induced by false representations "it is not necessary to aver or prove that the party making them at the time knew they were untrue."¹² The right to rescind is, however, often placed on other grounds than mere misrepresentation, such as warranty¹³ or mistake,¹⁴ or on the ground that the vendor is bound to know the truth of statements made by him concerning the property sold.¹⁵ This doctrine is the point at which, under the treatment of many courts, fraud and misrepresentation merge into an indistinguishable whole. The difficulty of making the distinction is increased by the inclination of the courts to refer to misrepresentation as "legal fraud."¹⁶ Other courts tend to class such a misrepresentation as "constructive fraud."¹⁷ Indeed, if the false statement is sufficient to avoid the contract, it makes no difference in the specific case as far as the validity of the contract is concerned whether it is a case of misrepresentation or of fraud.

If the person to whom a misrepresentation as to a collateral fact is made subsequently learns the truth and with full knowledge of the facts elects not to rescind, he thereby waives his right to rescind and elects to ratify the contract.¹ Such election may be made by voluntary performance with full knowledge of the facts,² or by acquiescence for an unreasonable time, especially if third persons are thereby induced to alter their position to their disadvantage.³ Possession of a written contract has been held equivalent to knowledge of its terms even though it was not read.⁴ While such waiver prevents rescission,⁵ and prevents the party performing from recovering on a quantum meruit, ignoring the terms of the contract,⁶ it does not prevent recovery for failure of consideration.⁷

MISTAKE IN THE INDUCEMENT.

§155. Mistake in the inducement not operative.

Mistake in the inducement exists, as we have seen,¹ when one party enters into a contract with full knowledge of the existence and identity of the essential elements thereof, namely, the adversary party, the subject-matter, the consideration, and the terms; but his willingness to enter into such contract is caused by his erroneous belief as to a collateral but material fact without which he would not have entered into such contract; and such erroneous belief is not due to any statement made by the adversary party. If the fact in question is immaterial the mistake is clearly inoperative since even fraud is inoperative if the statement concerns an immaterial matter.² If on the other hand, the erroneous belief is due to some statement made by the adversary party we have a case either of fraud³ or of misrepresentation.⁴ Mistake in the inducement is therefore limited as indicated. Now it is evident that very few contracts have ever been entered into where each party was fully advised of all the facts which were material, and which affected his willingness to enter into the contract. Whatever may be thought of the propriety from a moral standpoint of holding a person to a contract into which he entered under a mistake as to a collateral material fact, the law is confronted with the necessity of adopting a rule which will make it possible to enforce contracts at all. Accordingly the rule adopted by the great weight of authority is that mere mistake in the inducement is not operative and that a contract induced by reason thereof is perfectly enforceable and valid. A mistake of this sort is "an error for which the law furnishes no relief.”⁵ The rule is the same in equity.⁶ This distinction between the effect of mistake as to an essential element of a contract and mistake in the inducement has been sharply emphasized.⁷ In a leading English case it was held that a sale of oats by sample is valid though they are new oats and the vendee believes that he is buying old oats.⁸ So the purchase of realty under a mistake as to the quality of the land,⁹ or its value,¹⁰ the purchase of a horse under a mistake of fact as to its condition,¹¹ the purchase of an interest in a partnership under mistake as to its value,¹² a contract for the settlement of an estate, made under mistake as to the value of bank stock accepted by one of the parties as his share,¹³ the purchase of a machine under the mistaken belief that it was fit for a specific purpose,¹⁴ the purchase of a note under mistake as to the solvency of the maker, whether after¹⁵ or before¹⁶ such maker has made an assignment; the purchase of municipal bonds under a mistake as to their validity,¹⁷ and the purchase of government bonds under mistake as to the amount of premium due thereon,¹⁸ are all examples of contracts entered into under mistake of fact in the inducement, which are valid and binding. So where a party makes a mistaken estimate of the value of property,¹⁹ or where A sold B a note which both parties thought was secured by a first trust-deed, though in fact a prior trust-deed had been overlooked in searching the record,²⁰ such contracts cannot be avoided on the ground of mistake. One of the most extreme cases under this subject is Wood v. Boynton.²¹ In this case A sold a stone to B, both believing that it was probably a topaz, and both knowing that they did not know exactly what it was. The price was one dollar. It subsequently turned out that the stone was a rough diamond worth about seven hundred dollars. A on learning of these facts tendered one dollar and interest to B and demanded the stone. On B's refusal to deliver it, A sued him to recover the stone. It was held that A could not recover at law, the court declining to express an opinion as to whether A could obtain relief in a suit in equity. While this is an extreme case, since the actual value was so greatly in excess of the belief of the parties, the decision is undoubtedly correct. If the stone had proved to be worthless B could not have recovered the dollar paid by him. So where A enters into a contract with B by reason of mistake as to other collateral facts he cannot avoid liability on the contract; as where A is mistaken as to the terms of a contract made with X and because of that contracts with B,²² or A employs B as a trainer under mistake as to the speed qualities of A's horse,²³ or A makes a conveyance to B, thinking that the notes and mortgage received by her in payment would not be subject to taxation,²⁴ or A buys the interest of the heirs in an estate, not knowing that some of it has been devised by will to others,²⁵ or A is advised by counsel that a certain claim is a lien,²⁶ or A makes a mistake in estimating the amount of work done.²⁷ So a subscription cannot be rescinded because the purchaser thought she was buying stock in an existing corporation instead of organizing a new corporation,²⁸ and a purchaser of warrants cannot have rescission because seller and purchaser both believe that the bonds issued to take up the warrants will be four per cent. and in fact they are three and one-half per cent.²⁹ So where A is injured in an accident, and settles therefor with the company he cannot avoid the settlement if his injuries prove more severe than he had thought.³⁰ Conversely, if a car of fruit is damaged, and the carrier settles therefor, thinking that the car was injured in an accident, he cannot avoid the settlement on discovering that the car was only delayed thereby, and damaged by such delay.³¹ So where A offers to buy land from B, and B disclaims knowledge thereof but tells B what he has heard about the quality and location of the land, neither A nor B having seen it, and B buys it thinking such statement correct, he cannot avoid the sale on learning that it is incorrect.³² Where A published advertising for B, and as payment therefor was to receive a specified credit if he bought a launch from B, and seven years after, A assigned his claim to C, who concealed from B the fact that he was A's brother, and bought a launch from B at a low figure, and then offered this credit in part payment, it was held that B could not avoid the sale to C because he did not know that C held this credit.³³

There is some authority for holding, contrary to the weight of authority, that mistake in the inducement is operative in some extreme cases.¹ Thus, A sold to B, for eighty dollars, a cow which both thought was barren. If barren the cow was worth eighty dollars; if a breeder, seven hundred and fifty dollars to a thousand dollars. After the contract was made, it was discovered that the cow was with calf. A refused to perform, and B brought suit. It was held that "the mistake was not of the mere quality of the animal, but went to the very nature of the thing."² It needs only the foregoing quotation to show that the court decided the case on an erroneous theory as to the character of the mistake, from which followed the wrong conclusion as to its effect on the contract. While this case is an extreme one, it is hard to justify it on any theory that does not impair the validity of practically all contracts. Thus where A and B both thought that there was a vein of coal on A's land which could be worked profitably, and A leased the coal and timber privileges to B, at a royalty of ten cents a ton for coal and fifty cents a thousand feet for timber, and it turned out that no coal existed on such land suitable for working, it was held that A could have rescission.³ So a lease under the mistaken belief that an oil well existed on the land,⁴ or that there is a certain amount of timber thereon,⁵ is invalid. So where a county agreed to convey all its claims to swamp lands for a certain price, not knowing that an allowance of four thousand seven hundred and thirty acres had been made on a doubtful claim, rescission was allowed in equity.⁶ So where A sold property to B, both believing that it was in Whitehall, when in fact it was in Boston,⁷ or where A insured B's property, both believing that no

since the existence of a certain amount of timber on the land conveyed was made a term in the contract.

insurance was in force thereon, when in fact there was a policy in force which was avoided by the second policy,⁸ or where A and B, husband and wife, both thinking A solvent agreed that B should deed A her separate estate and A should by will divide his property equally among B and his children, her step-children, and A was in fact insolvent, so that B would lose everything unless rescission were allowed,⁹ or A conveyed property under the belief shared by grantee that a forthcoming bond had been properly executed and hence, by statute, had on forfeiture become a lien on such property,¹⁰ rescission has been allowed. Some of the cases cited in support of this proposition can really be explained on other grounds, such as lack of consideration, or breach. Other cases which seem to rest on this theory are cases in which the mistake really affected the identity of the subject-matter. Thus A assigned to B his claim against the Peruvian government for collection. Subsequently the Peruvian government credited this claim on its account against B. A not knowing of such payment agreed to sell this claim to B for an amount less than had already been collected thereon. It was held that A, on learning of the facts could recover the amount collected by B less the amount paid to him by B.¹¹ So a mistake as to the quantity of land sold really involves the subject-matter itself.¹² Those which cannot be explained except on the theory of mistake are excellent examples of the danger of allowing the courts to determine after the event what contract the parties would or would not have made in advance if they had known everything which could affect their liability, and to annul contracts which the court may believe that the parties would not have made.

NON-DISCLOSURE IN THE INDUCEMENT.

§157. Non-disclosure not operative in absence of special circumstances.

The mere omission by one party to disclose facts material to the contract, which are known to him and not to the adversary party does not, in the absence of special circumstances, amount to fraud or affect the validity of the contract.¹ Thus omission to disclose a prior mortgage on certain property,² a dispute as to a boundary line,³ that a larger sum than that offered will be paid for the land,⁴ as non-disclosure by a mortgagee of his intention to pay forty-five thousand five hundred dollars if necessary to get in the equity of redemption, by which he buys it for nineteen thousand dollars;⁵ or to disclose the actual purchase price of realty,⁶ or where land is purchased from the state the non-disclosure by the vendee of his intention to offer revenue bond script in payment in order to obtain a decision as to its validity,⁷ omission by a purchaser of land to disclose the existence of valuable minerals thereon,⁸ as oil,⁹ or granite,¹⁰ or to dis-

So a vendor of realty selling land to one buying it to mine ore is not liable for fraud because he does not disclose that the ore on the land is not suitable in quantity or in quality for the purposes of vendee.²⁷ So omission by one partner purchasing the interest of his co-partner to disclose the fact that he had entered into an unlawful monopolistic contract with other dealers which increased the value of the business, does not avoid the sale.²⁸ Even if the party omitting to make disclosure knows that the adversary party is mistaken as to a matter of inducement, and so knowing, keeps silence, the contract is binding.²⁹ Thus in accordance with a statute requiring the official engineer to estimate the quantity and character of excavations, such estimate was made, to be used by bidders. By mistake the engineer estimated the quantity of rock as less, and the quantity of earth as greater, than it really was. A, knowing this mistake, bid high on excavating rock and low on excavating earth, making his bid the lowest on the estimates, though not so on actual quantity. It was held that in the absence of fraud or collusion such bid should be accepted.³⁰ So in a contract made at the end of the war of 1812 for the sale of tobacco, the omission by the vendee to disclose to the vendor that a treaty of peace had been signed, the effect of which was to raise the price of tobacco, was held not to avoid the contract.³¹ So in contracts for compromise, at least where each party has equal means of obtaining knowledge,³² neither party is bound to make disclosure to the other, even if one party acquires a decided advantage by such non-disclosure.³³ While it is not proper to state as a matter of law that mere non-disclosure avoids the contract,³⁴ it may be a question of fact whether in view of the facts, and the partial disclosure made by one party to the other, full disclosure should have been made.³⁵

§158. Explanation of contrary view.

In some jurisdictions it is said to be the duty of a party to a contract to correct any material mistake made by the other and known to him.¹ Thus it has been said to be the duty of a party to a contract to disclose the existence of a mortgage on property conveyed,² to disclose the fact that coal, believed by the vendee to underlie the land, has been exhausted,³ to disclose facts known to vendee affecting the value of the property conveyed,⁴ to disclose the pendency of an action involving title to the realty conveyed,⁵ to disclose the fact that interest on a mortgage is secured collaterally,⁶ or to disclose the fact that the material to be excavated consisted largely of a conglomerate of clay and gravel very hard to remove.⁷ In many of the cases which lay down this rule, special facts exist which make it possible to decide them on other grounds. In some cases there has been such partial disclosure as coupled with non-disclosure is equivalent to a positive false statement;⁸ in others the mistake which the other party does not correct goes to the existence of the subject-matter, as where a valuable property right which the vendor does not know of, is included in the general terms of the instrument,⁹ and in others the omission to disclose is so unconscionable as to prevent specific performance.¹⁰

§159. Special duty to disclose facts.

It is often said that wherever there is a duty to disclose the material facts, non-disclosure constitutes fraud. This proposition is eminently safe, but not very helpful, unless we know what circumstances impose such duty. Some authorities have held, chiefly in obiter, that each party is bound to disclose to the other all facts known to himself, of which such other is ignorant. According to the weight of modern authority this rule is sound morality, but not law. The duty to disclose facts may arise in three general classes of ways. (1) The subject-matter of the contract may be such as to make full disclosure necessary. Such contracts are said to be contracts uberrimæ fidei, contracts of superabounding good faith.¹ Among contracts of this class in some states at least, are contracts of insurance and suretyship. (2) The duty to make full disclosure may arise from relations of trust and confidence which actually or technically exist between the parties. Duty to make disclosure in this case is treated under the head of Constructive Fraud. It may be questioned whether the first class here given is not really a part of the second, since trust and confidence in contracts of insurance and suretyship is necessarily reposed by one party in the other. The somewhat arbitrary line between the two is only another instance of the way in which actual fraud or non-disclosure merges into constructive fraud, and that in turn into undue influence. (3) The circumstances of the particular case may make non-disclosure have the effect of a specific fraudulent representation. Thus non-disclosure may be supplemented by some positive misstatement in such a way that neither without the other would amount to fraud, although when taken together they do. So a positive statement believed, when made, to be true, may be discovered to be false before acted upon. In such case it is the duty of the party making the statement to correct the misstatement. The doctrine of implied warranties may in a peculiar manner require disclosure in special cases. The first and third general classes of cases here noted will be discussed in this chapter.

In England insurance contracts are held to be avoided if the insured does not make a full disclosure to the insurer of all material facts known to the insured. This principle applies in England to marine insurance,¹ life insurance,² and indemnity insurance.³ In the United States it applies to marine insurance without much question.⁴ So where marine insurance is obtained upon a disclosure of facts then obtainable, it being understood that he is to furnish additional facts in a reasonable time, his failure so to do avoids the policy.⁵ Authorities are in conflict as to whether it applies to life insurance and fire insurance.⁶ Where the kind of insurance involved is held to be uberrimæ fidei, non-disclosure of a material fact, as of a fire in the neighborhood, possibly incendiary,⁷ or an attempt to burn the property insured,⁸ avoids the policy. The tendency in modern American law to hold that mere non-disclosure does not avoid the contract of insurance is due largely to the method of effecting insurance now generally prevailing. Specific interrogatories, usually in writing, are submitted to the insured, and upon his answers thereto the policy is usually based, in part at least. As a result of such business methods the view is often expressed that "the insured has a right to suppose that the insurer will make proper inquiries concerning all facts except such as are supposed to be known or are regarded as immaterial."⁹ Mere non-disclosure, therefore, does not avoid a contract of insurance where such view obtains,¹⁰ as long as such non-disclosure is not intentional and fraudulent.¹¹ Thus omission to disclose encumbrances,¹² as a real estate mortgage,¹³ a mechanic's lien,¹⁴ a vendor's lien,¹⁵ or a chattel mortgage,¹⁶ or the nature of the insurer's interest therein,¹⁷ as the retention of title by the vendor as security for the purchase price, the vendee effecting the insurance,¹⁸ or that the insured's interest is equitable merely,¹⁹ or that the insured is a married woman,²⁰ or the location of property insured,²¹ do not avoid the policy. Statutes which provide that policies shall be void only if the false statement is fraudulent and material; or fraudulent or material,²² prevent mere innocent non-disclosure from avoiding the contract of insurance.²³ Omission to disclose facts not known to the insured, as in life insurance, an ailment unknown to him,²⁴ does not of course avoid the policy. If an answer to interrogatories in the application on which the policy is issued is on its face incomplete, the insurance company may, of course, refuse to issue the policy; but if it issues the policy the evident omission to make full disclosure is thereby waived.²⁵ It will be seen, therefore, that the weight of authority in the United States is that mere innocent non-disclosure does not avoid a contract of insurance other than marine insurance. In practical results the principles governing marine insurance are not as unlike those governing other kinds of insurance in the United States as would be inferred from their abstract form. In many of the cases cited to show that full disclosure is not necessary in contracts of insurance other than marine, the facts are such that a similar result would have been reached in marine insurance on the theory that the facts were not material. Many of the cases cited to show that non-disclosure avoids marine insurance involve facts, the non-disclosure of which would avoid any other insurance policy on the theory that such non-disclosure was fraudulent.

To what extent a contract of suretyship is uberrimæ fidei with reference to non-disclosure is a question upon which there is a conflict of authority. Some courts hold that when a contract of suretyship is made, the creditor is bound to disclose to the surety every material fact which can affect the risk of the surety substantially. The proposition is laid down that non-disclosure releases a surety if it concerns such facts that (1) the surety would not have entered into the contract if he had known them, or (2) his risk is thereby increased.¹ Non-disclosure "which necessarily must have the effect of increasing the responsibility of the surety or operating to the prejudice of his interest" releases him.² Where this view obtains if the creditor omits to disclose all the material facts known to him, the surety may avoid the contract,³ as for omission to disclose the amount of the debt or obligation,⁴ or that the maker and payee of the note to which the party is to become surety were firms having a common partner,⁵ or in case of a general guaranty, to disclose a former defalcation of the principal obligor,⁶ or former negligence whereby the principal obligor had damaged his employer.⁷ So in a continuing guaranty it is held that the creditor must notify the guarantor or surety of subsequent dishonesty of the principal or the surety will be released.⁸ This rule even in jurisdictions which apply it most strictly does not include omissions of a public officer taking a bond to notify the surety of past negligence on the part of the principal, at least if not criminal.⁹ So the fact that the officer taking a criminal bond does not disclose the fact that other charges of larceny have been brought against the accused, does not relieve the surety.¹⁰ Other courts require a less degree of good faith on the part of the creditor towards the surety, and in the absence of special facts, treat mere non-disclosure as inoperative.¹¹ The duty to make full disclosure, it is said in such jurisdictions, is "peculiar to contracts of insurance and does not extend to contracts of guaranty."¹² "A creditor is not bound in the absence of inquiries from the sureties to communicate to them all the circumstances that may affect their undertaking."¹³ Thus omission to inform the surety of irregularities of the principal in making collections,¹⁴ or to inform him of a judgment in favor of the obligee against the principal,¹⁵ have been held not to release the surety. So mere silence as to the commencement of proceedings to remove a trustee, by which he is enabled to furnish additional bond does not release such surety.¹⁶ Under either theory actual fraud on the part of the creditor avoids the contract of suretyship, as where the obligee represented falsely to that surety that the principal wished him to sign.¹⁷ So the contract of the surety may be avoided if the creditor knows that the principal has induced the sureties to sign by fraud. Thus a payee who knows that the maker means to use fraud to obtain indorsers is responsible therefor unless he informs indorsers of the facts.¹⁸ An attempt has been made to reconcile the conflict of authority by holding that non-disclosure of facts which affect the liability of the surety avoid his contract if such facts constitute a crime,¹⁹ or affect the integrity of the principal debtor,²⁰ while if not of such character, the surety is liable.²¹ This distinction does in fact reconcile many cases, in most of which, however, it is not stated by the court as a ground for its decision. It has, however, been expressly repudiated.²² The surety has in some jurisdictions been held even where the fact that the principal debtor was a defaulter has not been disclosed,²³ in other he is released, though the non-disclosure concerned only the negligence of the principal.²⁴ fraud exists even if the concealment was really the operative factor in the deceit.¹ Thus fraud exists where a debtor by misstatement had given the community in which he lived to understand that he was execution-proof and thus knowingly concealing the fact that he had property subject to execution sufficient to pay the whole claim of his creditor, settled for less, making no false representation to the creditor.² Thus giving a statement of liabilities, but omitting a note, as where there was a deliberate omission from a statement of the liabilities of a firm of a note given by it to a bank, which represented the interest of the president of the bank in the firm and which he was to pay,³ amounts to fraud. But where the president of a corporation omitted from a statement of its liabilities a claim then in litigation, which on reasonable grounds he believed could not be enforced against the company, he was held not liable for fraud to the purchasers of bonds,⁴ and omission from the statement of a firm of the liabilities of the individual members is not fraud.⁵ A's stating that stock was worthless, but that he wished it as a memorial of his father, concealing an offer made to him for it,⁶ a statement that title was good, concealing the fact that a prior grantor was insane, when he conveyed it,⁷ stating that A, a prominent business man, has subscribed for stock, concealing the fact that he gets it for nothing,⁸ entering a fictitious deposit on A's bankbook and concealing from B on inquiry that such deposit was never made,⁹ concealing the value of land, and informing vendor who knows nothing of the facts that the better part had been disposed of,¹⁰ or concealing knowledge of valuable deposits of phosphates and stating that the land was valuable only for pine,¹¹ are cases of fraud. Acquiescence in misstatements by others, together with concealment of the truth, may be fraud.¹²

If one has made statements, which were true when made, and a material change takes place,¹ as a change for the worse in financial condition,² or impairment in value of a trade-mark,³ he is guilty of fraud in not disclosing such change where he knows or should know that the other party relies on such original representation. A similar rule obtains where a false statement was made in good faith but the falsity was discovered before the adversary party acted thereon.⁴ But a slight change in financial condition need not be communicated,⁵ nor need change be communicated where it is not known that the adversary party relied on the original statement.⁶

The rule that disclosure is not necessary except in special cases is modified greatly in its practical operation by the doctrine of implied warranties. In contracts of sale the vendor is, in the absence of express agreement to the contrary, assumed to

they are merchantable.¹⁴ Where there is a chance for the vendee to examine the goods sold, there is, at least, an implied warranty that there are no latent defects known to the vendor and not disclosed to the vendee.¹⁵ Since vendor knows such facts, such non-disclosure is in many states held to amount to fraud.¹⁶ Thus where animals are sold, apparently sound, but really diseased, and vendor knows thereof, such sales are voidable.¹⁷ In some of the cases cited on this point, false statements were made intentionally; as where vendor said that an animal was "sound as far as he knew," when he knew of a latent defect,¹⁸ or there has been a partial and misleading disclosure.¹⁹ Thus a sale of an impotent bull for breeding purposes was held fraud.²⁰ So a sale of a blind horse, vendor knowing such fact was held to amount to fraud.²¹ So where vendor knows that his animals are suffering from a contagious disease it has been held fraud for him to sell them to a vendee ignorant thereof; and vendor has been held liable for loss of vendee's other stock.²² Analogous to this principle is the rule that it is fraud in one who sells the note of another not to disclose the known insolvency of such ther.²³ This classification of implied warranties, while not exhaustive, furnishes examples of the more common types. In other cases there is no implied warranty. The vendee must judge for himself or exact an express warranty.²⁴ Even where an implied warranty would usually exist, an express warranty excludes an implied warranty.²⁵ Where warranties are implied the vendor if ignorant of the defect warranted against is liable as on breach of contract; while if he knows of the defect when he makes the sale, he is also liable as for fraud.²⁶ The application of this doctrine, therefore, limits the right of the vendor to refrain from disclosing defects known to him; though, as has been said, the doctrine applies even if the vendor acted in good faith.²⁷

It is an implied term of an executory contract for the sale of realty that the title is good.¹ This requires a marketable title in Georgia providing for an implied warranty of merchantability, even if vendor is ignorant of the disease. Snowden v. Waterman, 105 Ga. 384; 31 S. E. 110; same case, 100 Ga. 588; 28 S. and not an absolutely perfect title.² This rule does not apply to defects of which the vendee has actual or constructive notice.³ This implied term does not survive conveyance. If there is a covenant of warranty it merges such implied term;⁴ if there is no such covenant in the deed, the acceptance of such deed waives such implied term.⁵ The general rule is that there is no implied warranty as to the title of realty after an executed conveyance thereof. Non-disclosure of a defect in title not apparent on the face of the papers shown to establish title has been held to be fraud.⁶ There is no implied warranty that realty leased for a long term is fit for occupancy.⁷ A lease of residence property for a short term impliedly warrants that it is reasonably fit for occupancy.⁸ There is an implied warranty against latent defects, if known to the landlord and not disclosed to the tenant.⁹ Thus there is an implied warranty that it is not affected with any serious contagious disease, as small-pox.¹⁰

CHAPTER X.

FRAUD, MISREPRESENTATION, MISTAKE AND NON-DISCLOSURE AS TO MATTERS OF LAW.

§166. Fraudulent misrepresentation of domestic law.

False statements as to the existence or effect of a rule of domestic law, applicable to and affecting the rights of the parties, do not constitute fraud at law; nor in equity in many jurisdictions.¹ This rule rests on two reasons. The one usually given is that every one is presumed to know the law; but this proposition is applicable chiefly to criminal law; and as we shall see later, does not always apply in civil matters. The real reason for the rule is that where the material facts are known, and the parties are on terms of equality, law is a matter of opinion and every one must know that it is. Where the material facts are known, false statement as to the legal effect of a will,² a tax-sale,³ or a contract,⁴ as that insured is bound by an inventory of her property before loss and the company is liable only for three-fourths of such valuation less the value of the goods saved,⁵ that power to an agent to sell includes power to contract for sale,⁶ that an option is legally binding,⁷ or a statement that a married woman must sign the note evidencing the mortgage debt as well as the mortgage to bar her dower,⁸ are none of them fraud. In other jurisdictions equity gives relief against fraudulent misrepresentations as to the existence or effect of rules of domestic law.⁹ Thus a misrepresentation as to the legal effect of a deed;¹⁰ or as to the liability of an insurance company after loss, as that it was not liable where the insured was not the sole owner of the property insured,¹¹ or where the insured property was mortgaged¹² has been held ground for rescinding a contract

"The weight of authority and the decisions of 'this court would now forbid that a party, who, with full knowledge of the ignorance of the other contracting party, has not only encouraged that ignorance and made it more dense by his own false and fraudulent misrepresentations, but has wilfully deceived and led that other into a mistaken conception of his legal rights, should shield himself behind the general doctrine that a mere mistake of law affords no ground for relief." Titus v. Ins. Co., 97 Ky. 567; 53 Am. St. Rep. 426; 28 L. R. A. 478; 31 S. W. 127. "There is an equitable rule to the effect that when there is a mistake of law or fact by one party which is induced, aided or accompanied by inequitable conduct of the other containing elements of wrongful intent, such as misrepresentation or concealment, a court of equity will lend its aid and relieve from the consequences of the error." *German Savings Bank v. Under § 1578 of the California Civil Code, allowing relief where all parties misapprehend the law and make substantially the same mistake, relief may be had for misrepresentation of law: as for a misrepresentation as to the right of the mortgagee to the rents and profits before foreclosure. *Gregory v. caused thereby. In many of these cases, however, it will be found that the decisive fact is that a contract has been made or a right surrendered without legal consideration; and that misrepresentation of law has been merely the means of inducing the adversary party to enter into such gratuitous contract.¹³ Some of the cases involving fraudulent misrepresentation of law concern contracts which are otherwise invalid. If, by reason of a misrepresentation of law, a contract without consideration, to surrender legal rights is entered into such contract is unenforceable.¹⁴

If the parties are in fiduciary relations in which actual trust and confidence is reposed, such as attorney and client,¹ step-mother and step-son,² or persons about to intermarry,³ so that one of them has a right to rely on the opinion of the other, a misrepresentation of law may amount to fraud. Thus where attorneys represented to their client that their fees must by law be secured in advance, and thus induce him to give a note and mortgage, and afterwards they foreclosed the mortgage and bought in the property without rendering the services, rescission was allowed.⁴ If trust and confidence are actually reposed, a misrepresentation of law may amount to fraud even if the relations between the parties are not such as to imply trust and confidence.⁵ Thus a representation made to a widow by the executors of her husband's will that she has no dower rights and is dependent on the bounty of the heirs for anything in excess of the provisions of the will, is fraud where such executors knew that the widow relied on their advice, and that her husband when living had told her so to rely.⁶ If, on the other hand, trust and confidence are not reposed, the mere fact of a relationship in which trust and confidence normally exist does not of itself make a representation of law operate as fraud.⁷ Thus where divorce proceedings are pending, and the wife is represented by an attorney, her husband's representation that all the property in dispute was his sole property and none of it community property, is not fraud, though false, where the facts were known to her.⁸

If the material facts are not known to the party to whom the false representations of law are made, a statement may be in such form as to involve not only law, but fact as well, and may accordingly be fraud. Thus a statement that one has a perfect title, no other facts being given,¹ that a certain title is defective,² that a deed to certain realty is the only conveyance thereof,³ that a certain will⁴ or deed⁵ does not pass certain realty, that a tract of land is free from incumbrances,⁶ or that a certain deed is a forgery,⁷ are material facts; and not mere representations of law. However, a mere reference to "my land" is an identification of the tract rather than a statement of title.⁸

So, a statement that a mortgage is the first lien on the premises, no other facts being given from which such statement could be shown to be an opinion,⁹ or that a certain amount of property is covered thereby,¹⁰ are statements of fact. So false representation as to easements and appurtenances affecting the value of the land, which could not have been ascertained by an examination,¹¹ or that a right of way over adjoining land is appurtenant to the tract conveyed,¹² are statements of fact. statement as to the protection of an invention by a patent,¹⁵ or of a book by copyright,¹⁶ or that a given patent does not infringe another patent,¹⁷ are all statements of material facts, and may constitute fraud; while if the specific facts had been given in detail, and the falsity had consisted in the statement of their legal effect, such statements would not have constituted fraud. So a statement that a certain insurance company has been formed under a specified statute involves fact as well as law.¹⁸

§169. Representations of Foreign Law.

The foregoing propositions apply to representations of domestic law only. In fraud, as generally, foreign law is treated as a fact, and a misstatement thereof may be fraud,¹ as where one is induced thereby to enter into a contract controlled by such foreign law and illegal thereunder.² What law is foreign and what domestic is a question upon which there is some confusion. The rule in force seems to be that the law of the domicile of the party who alleges mistake or misrepresentation of law is as to him domestic law; and the law of other jurisdictions is foreign law, if he brings his suit in the jurisdiction of his domicile. So a mistake made by a citizen of Massachusetts concerning a rule of New York law is treated as a mistake of fact.³ Even if he brings the suit in the jurisdiction concerning the law of which he made the mistake in question, he may treat such mistake as a mistake of fact. A representation by a citizen of Iowa to an alien domiciled and residing in Germany concerning a question of Iowa law affecting title to Iowa land has been held to be a representation of fact.⁴ So one domiciled in Ohio, who there discounts a negotiable instrument illegally issued in New York, under mistake as to New York law, may in an action in New York treat such mistake as one of fact and recover the money paid for such negotiable instrument.⁵

§170. Innocent misrepresentation of law.

The general rule is that no relief can be given for innocent misrepresentation of law.¹ Thus when A sold to B certain municipal bonds, representing that they were valid, the material facts being known to both parties, no relief was given on the ground that it was an erroneous legal opinion.² So a misrepresentation that corporate stock was non-assessable beyond a certain per cent of its face value, all the facts being known, was not ground for rescinding a sale thereof.³ So a misrepresentation as to the legal liability on a contract of indorsement made after the note had been delivered to the payee, who did not indorse it over does not avoid a subsequent indorsement on a new note, extending the time of payment.⁴ So in insurance, to avoid the policy the misrepresentation must be one of fact as distinguished from one of law. Thus, where the agent knows all the facts as to the title of the insured, and the insured, believing that he owns the property in fee represents that he is the sole owner, the policy is valid, though the courts afterwards decide that the insured's interest in three-fourths of the property was a life interest only.⁵ In some cases equity has relieved against a misrepresentation of law. Thus where A gave his daughter B a lease for her life of a house, and after A's death, intestate, the other heirs in good faith represented to B that her lease was invalid and thereby induced her to surrender her share of A's estate in return for a lease from such other heirs of the same house, misrepresentation was held to avoid B's release of her share of A's estate.⁶

"A mistake of law happens when a party having full knowledge of the facts, comes to an erroneous conclusion as to their legal effect."¹ Some authorities have attempted to lay down the rule that relief should always be given for a mistake of law, arising from the erroneous result of active inquiry into the law,² though no relief should be given for ignorance of the law, arising from omission to make inquiry into the law. This attempted distinction has been very generally repudiated.³

If the parties to the contract know the material facts, but by mistake of law, draw an erroneous conclusion as to the legal consequences flowing from such facts, and are thereby induced to enter into the contract when but for such mistake they would not have done so, the general rule (to be, as we shall see later, sharply hedged in by exceptions) is that such mistake has no effect in making such contract invalid.⁴ Thus, A devised realty to B in fee and B thought that she had a fee, not knowing that A could not deprive his minor children of their homestead. Under this mistake of law, B borrowed money of C to pay off a mortgage on such realty held by X. C, finding that his mortgage was inferior to the homestead rights of A's minor children, sued to be subrogated to X's mortgage. This relief was refused.⁵ A surety who had been released from liability on the original note, and not knowing that by law he is released, signs a new note for an extension of time is liable thereon.⁶ Thus if A makes a contract with full knowledge of its terms under an erroneous belief that it does not bind him,⁷ he cannot have relief. So if A takes a conveyance from her husband B without covenants of warranty under a mistaken belief that A and B are tenancies by entireties,⁸ or if A agreed to and did convey to a railroad a right of way across his farm, not knowing that it would prevent him from recovering damages for injury to the rest of his farm,⁹ no relief can be had.

The early English rule was that relief should be given for a mistake of law if the rule of law was plain,¹⁰ but not if it were doubtful.¹¹ This rule has been criticised and not followed.¹²

An exception to this general rule is made by some eminent authorities as follows. If the mistake is a mistake as to a general rule of law, the rule already given applies, and no relief can be given; but if it is a mistake as to the private right of a party to the contract, the contract may be avoided therefor.¹ In applying this principle a mistake as to one's title to realty,² or as to the validity of a lien on one's realty,³ or a mistake as to the legal effect of a note, such as whether it carried interest,⁴ or ignorance of a right to avoid a contract,⁵ are such mistakes as to private rights as furnish ground for avoiding the contract.

While this distinction is indorsed by excellent authority, it is, nevertheless, a difficult one to apply as a test. In order to be mistaken as to a private right, when all the facts are known, one must generally be mistaken as to some rule of general law and mistakes as to the rules of general law are material, as a rule, only when they cause mistake as to private rights. The commonest form of so-called mistake as to private right is where one party is mistaken as to the ownership of property. Now the question of ownership of property is often treated as an ultimate question of fact, even when its determination depends ence between this bid, and the true amount of the debt, $3,000, plus the costs of foreclosure. A sought to avoid his purchase. It was held that he could do so. In Gerdine v. Menage, 41 Minn. 417; 43 N. W. 91, X tried to foreclose a mortgage and thought he had done so in legal form. He then paid off liens on such property. The foreclosure being set aside, he was allowed subrogation to the liens thus paid off. But in Truesdale v. Sidle, 65 Minn. 315; 67 N. W. 1004, A, thinking that a note and mortgage given by B included attorney fees, added that amount to the debt, interest and costs of foreclosure, and bid that sum for the property. B sued A to recover the amount of the bid in excess of A's debt and costs, which amounted to the supposed attorney fees. The value of the lots having depreciated, A was not allowed to avoid his bid.

§173. Mistake of law causing gratuitous promise.

There are, however, some exceptions to the general rule, on which the authorities are in substantial accord. If A is not in fact liable at all to B, a promise to pay made under mistake as Subsequently, not knowing that he could rescind his release he ratified. It was held that in an action at law he could avoid the release and the ratification thereof.) According to some authorities ratification after majority of a contract made during infancy, by one who does not know that infancy is a defense may be avoided on the ground of mistake of law. to his liability is void.¹ Thus, where A gave a release to B's assignee in insolvency, thinking that he would receive a dividend on his claim therefor, but the release was filed too late to enable A to receive a dividend, A was allowed to enforce cancellation of the release and to maintain an action on the original debt.² So where A owned a mare and left it with B, and X, B's husband sold it, and was indicted for larceny, and A and B, mistakenly thinking that the only question involved in X's case was the ownership of the mare, agreed that A should take charge of the mare, but if X were acquitted, he should return her to B, no valid contract existed.³ In cases of this class the presence of the mistake obscures the controlling feature of the case, which is that there is no consideration for the promise and that even if there were no mistake such promise would be unenforceable. If mistake at all, it is really a form of mistake as to the subject-matter.⁴

§174. Mistake of law coupled with inequitable conduct.

If the party acting under mistake of law is also subject to undue influence a still clearer case for equitable relief exists.¹ Thus rescission was given of a conveyance of a homestead by a grantor 86 years old, believing that it could be taken from him by a judgment in a threatened suit for slander.² Thus where an executor, in whom the legatees confide, takes a release from one of them knowing that it is given under the mistaken belief that such legacy had lapsed, such release may be avoided.³ In cases of this sort, the true ground of relief is not the mistake of law per se; but the fact that all the circumstances of the case show that the party seeking relief was the victim of constructive fraud or undue influence.

§175. Mistake as to foreign law.

A mistake as to a rule of foreign law is always treated as a mistake of fact.¹ The question of what law is to be treated as foreign and what as domestic has been considered in connection with misrepresentations of foreign law.²

CONSTRUCTIVE FRAUD.

I. NATURE.

§176. Nature of constructive fraud.

It is difficult to frame a definition of constructive fraud which will at once be accurate and include all that the legal concept embraces. The rules of constructive fraud have been developed by courts in cases in which they have refused to frame definitions of fraud, or to be controlled in giving relief by specific and definite rules in regard to fraud.¹ Other facts intensify the difficulty. Unlike one another as the extreme types of fraud, duress, and incapacity may be, there are many cases in which dishonest and inequitable conduct which may not amount to actual fraud, coupled with an amount of moral compulsion which may not amount to technical duress is brought to bear, either on a person who is of feeble capacity, though not suffering from actual insanity or imbecility; or else upon a person who reposes especial trust and confidence in the adversary party to the contract. In cases like this it may be as easy to see that the contract ought not to be enforced as it is difficult to lay down a general principle stating the exact combination of facts which induced the court to give relief in that particular case, and which it will apply in the future to similar cases. When the propriety of granting relief is clear, it is not always necessary under our system of jurisprudence to classify the case carefully as one of constructive fraud or undue influence. Furthermore, the doctrines of constructive fraud have grown by piece meal. Particular classes of cases have been recognized by the courts as referable to constructive fraud, long before the general principles underlying the particular classes of cases have been worked out into accurate forms of statement. While such a state of affairs is always to be regretted, it is inevitable under a theory of the law which restricts the power and jurisdiction of its courts to deciding the specific case then on trial, and makes impossible an official and authoritative statement of the general principles which the courts are ready to apply to other cases not before it. A further source of difficulty is that courts and text-writers have included under constructive fraud classes of cases that have no connection with it. One of the clearest and profoundest of writers has included under the head of constructive fraud, illegal contracts.² Fraud, actual or constructive, is operative only when it affects offer and acceptance, making the agreement thus apparently reached either void or voidable. Illegal contracts are unenforceable solely on account of their subject-matter. It is perfectly possible, and usually the case, that in an illegal contract, offer and acceptance result in a perfect meeting of the minds, though on a subject-matter about which the law does not allow parties to contract. A tentative definition of constructive fraud is, however, a necessity. The following may be suggested. Constructive fraud consists of such acts or omissions, not amounting to actual fraud, as on account of the peculiar relations of the parties to the contract, render the contract induced thereby as unenforceable as actual fraud would have made it.³

II. BETWEEN WHAT PARTIES CONSTRUCTIVE FRAUD MAY EXIST.

§177. Constructive fraud limited to relations of trust and confidence.

The definition of constructive fraud here given includes a special relation between the parties to the contract as an essential element. Probably constructive fraud in the accurate sense of the term does not exist between persons of normal status, who repose no especial trust and confidence in each other and deal with each other at arm's length. Where relations of special trust and confidence exist, however, facts which do not amount to actual fraud may have its legal effect.¹ "A breach of duty is 'constructive fraud.'"² If A occupies a fiduciary relation to B³ and engages in a transaction with B which is prejudicial to B, such transaction is presumptively fraudulent,⁴ and if it appears that B did not have full knowledge of his legal rights,⁵ or even if it does not appear affirmatively that B had such knowledge,⁶ such transaction will be set aside for constructive fraud. In such cases it is for A to show affirmatively that such a transaction is fair and honest or it will be presumed fraudulent. The relations between the parties which make constructive fraud possible are of two different kinds. The trust and confidence reposed may be general, as in relations between husband and wife, parent and child and the like. In other cases, as between principal and agent, partners, directors and the corporation or the stockholders, the trust and confidence may be reposed as to a certain limited subject-matter, while as to other matters the same parties may occupy no relation of trust and confidence. Further, the relations of trust and confidence may be technical ones, such as those between principal and agent, and the like, or though no technical relations of trust and confidence exist, actual trust and confidence may be reposed.

ed between the parties at the time of the transaction alleged to be fraudulent, such as trustee and cestui que trust, principal and agent, attorney and client, husband and wife, guardian and ward, or where one of the parties for any other reason possesses influence or power over the other, the law raises a presumption of fraud whenever the party in whom the confidence is reposed obtains from the other a contract to his own profit." *Schneider v. §178. Non-disclosure in general as constructive fraud.

The difference between actual and constructive fraud can be seen best by considering the elements of actual fraud and observing which of them are non-essential in constructive fraud. Thus, an active misstatement of a material fact, or a wilful and active concealment thereof is an essential element of actual fraud in order to avoid ordinary contracts.¹ Between persons in relations of especial trust and confidence, constructive fraud may exist by reason of mere non-disclosure. Even if the party reposing trust and confidence does not care with whom he deals and the identity of the adversary party is of no consequence to him, the person in whom trust is reposed cannot conceal his identity and act as the adversary party to the contract. If he does so, constructive fraud exists.² If he discloses his identity, he must furthermore make full and complete disclosure of all material facts known to him,³ and must make a fair and reasonable contract. If he does not do this the contract thus induced is voidable for constructive fraud. If he does, the contract may be valid. The party in whom trust is reposed must not make any secret gain for himself out of the subject-matter of such trust and confidence. If he does so, the person reposing such trust and confidence may make him account for such gain. The propositions here stated will be more fully developed in the following sections.

§179. Principal and agent.

The elements of constructive fraud may best be understood from a discussion of their applications to the particular relations existing between the parties. An agent who makes a contract on his principal's behalf with himself, is guilty of constructive fraud if he does not disclose to the principal the fact that the agent is the adversary party to the contract, even if it is a matter of indifference to the principal with whom he contracts.¹ Thus the agent of an insurance company cannot issue a policy to himself.² An agent cannot buy his principal's property without disclosing his identity and getting his principal's assent.³ Equity will not give specific performance when an agent has sold his principal's property to one in partnership with the agent, without disclosing these facts to the principal.⁴ The existence of constructive fraud is especially clear where the agent has prevented others from attempting to purchase his principal's property.⁵ While an agent cannot by the use of the name of a third person conceal his identity and buy his principal's property, yet if the agent sells property for his principal to a third person by a bona fide contract, the agent may subsequently purchase such property from such vendee.⁶ The test of the validity of the contract in such cases is whether the vendee had at the time of making the purchase an understanding with the agent for a reconveyance to the latter, in which case the contract is fraudulent; or whether the agreement between the vendee and the agent for a reconveyance was entered into after such sale, in which case the contract is valid. Where the principal knows that the agent is representing an adverse interest as well as the interest of the principal,⁷ the fact that the alleged agent has concealed his identity and that he is really the adverse party to the contract does not avoid it. An agent in dealing with his principal as adversary party or in making contracts on behalf of his principal with third persons, must §181. Officers of private and public corporations.

A director or officer of a private corporation may contract with the corporation if he discloses his interest, deals fairly with the corporation, and does not himself act for it in the matter in which his personal interest is adverse to that of the corporation, but leaves its interests in the hands of those directors and officers who are interested solely in the corporation.¹ Thus he may make a valid contract of loan,² sale,³ purchase,⁴ or employment,⁵ or a contract in payment of a prior debt due from the corporation to the director,⁶ or to indemnify him for becoming liable as accommodation indorser⁷ for the corporation. So a director may buy up claims against the corporation at a discount, and enforce them in full, if in his official capacity he is under no duty to pay the claim.⁸ So, if a mining corporation has forfeited its claim and a stranger re-locates it without any arrangement to re-sell to anyone, a director of the mining corporation may subsequently in good faith purchase such claim.⁹ As such officers and directors occupy relations of trust and confidence to the stockholders and creditors of the corporation, their dealings with it are sharply scrutinized. "Any arrangement by which directors of a corporation become interested adversely to such corporation in contracts with it, or organize or take stock in companies or associations for the purpose of entering into contracts with the corporation, or become parties to any undertaking to secure to themselves a share in the profits of any transactions to which the corporation is also a party, will be looked upon with suspicion."¹⁰ Hence if the officer or director represents the corporation in the matter in which he is adversely interested¹¹ as where, as directors, they buy from themselves,¹² disclose material facts acquired in their official capacity, which affect the value of the stock.

In the absence of statute the validity of a contract between a municipality or other public corporation and an officer thereof depends first on whether such officer is avowedly contracting in his own name, or is secretly receiving compensation to influence his official conduct. In the latter case the city is free to avoid the contract on the ground of such fraud, if it chooses,³² and the contract is invalid. If the officer acts openly and avowedly in his own interest, the validity of his contract depends on whether he is acting both for himself and the city, in inconsistent attitudes, in which case the contract is invalid,³³ or whether he acts for himself alone, and other agents independent of himself represent the city, in which case such contract is valid.³⁴ The courts do not agree on the validity of a contract made by a board, council or other aggregate body with one of its own members, some holding such contracts valid at common law,³⁵ and others, void.³⁶ In the absence of statute, contracts between a public corporation and an officer thereof, if not valid, are voidable rather than either void or illegal. Thus if no statute makes it unlawful, a contract between a city official and a city may be avoided, but recovery can be had on a quantum meruit,³⁷ or the proper officers of the municipality may if they choose ratify such contract.³⁸ In many states the questions here considered are settled by statute making a contract with a municipality unlawful if any officer thereof is interested directly or indirectly in such contract.³⁹ Under such a statute a board of school trustees cannot employ the wife of one of the trustees as a teacher.⁴⁰ Under such statute no recovery can be had on such contract, or for reasonable compensation for materials and services furnished,⁴¹ and under some statutes the officer can be compelled to repay to the government what he has received under such contract.⁴² Such statute does not apply to the right to recover for such articles as gas furnished in accordance with the requirements of law and the ordinance giving the gas company its franchise, and not under an express contract.⁴³ By some statutes, a corporation the stockholders of which are city officials cannot contract with such city.⁴⁴ In the absence of statute a contract between a corporation and a city under such circumstances is not invalid.⁴⁵ So where the legislature let the state printing to a corporation whose president was a member of the legislature it was held that such contract was valid, since it appeared that his compensation as president was a fixed salary, and not dependent on the profits earned by such corporation.⁴⁶

§182. Contracts between corporations having common officers.

While a contract requires two parties, the legal fiction of the separate existence of a corporation from its members and officers makes it possible for a valid contract to be made between two corporations which have the same directors¹ or the same officers, as the same treasurer, auditors, and cashier,² or a common agent.³ Such contracts are subject to sharp scrutiny because of the opportunities for fraud thus given,⁴ and if such contract is so framed as to give to one corporation an unfair advantage at the expense of the other, and the common directors represent both corporations at once the corporation of which such advantage is taken may avoid the contract.⁵ Such con-

§183. Promoters of corporations.

Promoters of corporations stand in a relation of trust and confidence to the corporation and to the stockholders thereof.¹ If promoters wish to sell their property to the corporation promoted by them, they must deal with independent and impartial directors who represent the corporation and not the promoters:² they must make full disclosure of their own identity and their interest in the property which they convey to the company,³ and they must disclose the material facts affecting the value of the property transferred by them to the corporation, and therefore affecting the value of the corporate stock.⁴ If the promoters conceal the fact that they are acting in an interest adverse to that of the corporation and thereby attempt to obtain a secret profit for themselves,⁵ or to obtain a secret commission for sell-

An action for secret profits may be maintained,⁷ or the contract of the corporation may be rescinded.⁸ If, however, the promoter makes full disclosure of the fact of his adverse interest and of all material facts, he may sell to the corporation at a profit.⁹

§184. Partners.

Partners occupy a relation of especial trust and confidence towards each other with reference to partnership matters.¹ In dealing with each other with reference to partnership matters, each must make full and fair disclosure to the other of all material facts known to him and not to the other.² Thus, omission by a partner to disclose to his co-partner facts affecting the value of partnership property may constitute fraud.³ Thus, a purchase of one partner's interest in mining property by the other is voidable where the vendee does not disclose the existence of a valuable vein of ore on such property.⁴ A partner who, in the absence of the other partner, effects a purchase of partnership property must show affirmatively that the transaction was fair and upon full disclosure of material facts.⁵ So, a surviving partner stands in a relation of trust and confidence to the executor of the deceased partner, so that a contract whereby the surviving partner buys the partnership assets from such executor will be closely scrutinized and will be enforced only if reasonable, fair and just.⁶ A partner cannot without the consent of his co-partners acquire an interest in partnership property adverse to his co-partners from third persons.⁷ A partner cannot, without the consent of his co-partners, acquire a renewal of a lease held by the firm of realty on which the firm has made valuable improvements.⁸ So he cannot deal with the firm, concealing his identity, and thereby make a contract which the firm cannot avoid.⁹ A partner cannot acquire secret profit for himself in the same business as the partnership and in competition with it. He must account for such profits to the partnership.¹⁰ He may, however, engage in business for himself outside the business of the partnership,¹¹ and he is not liable to the partnership for such profits even if the partnership contract bound him not to engage in other business.¹² He cannot buy property for the firm and charge the firm therefor more than the amount thus paid by him.¹³ He cannot represent the firm in a transaction and in the same transaction represent an adverse interest from which he receives a commission.¹⁴ A partner may, however, deal with the firm if the remaining partners know all the material facts and represent the firm in the transaction.¹⁵ Thus he may sell property to the firm in consideration of which the firm assumes certain debts which he owes.¹⁶

"It is well settled that co-tenants stand in a certain relation to each other of mutual trust and confidence; that neither will be permitted to act in hostility to the other in reference to the joint estate; and that a distinct title acquired by one will enure to the benefit of all."¹ It is even clearer that a co-tenant cannot take advantage of his own breach of duty to acquire interests in the property owned in common adverse to those of his co-tenants. Thus a co-tenant who buys at a tax sale the property owned in common holds for his co-tenants if they choose to contribute.² So, where two co-tenants, A and B, bought of C and as part of the purchase price assumed a debt due from C to X, and A made default in paying such debt by reason of which the property was sold to Y, who conveyed to A's son, it was held that as it appeared that A's son was advancing the money for the property as a loan to his father, and took the title in his own name for security, A held B's original interest in the property in trust for B.³ Omission by a co-owner in a partition suit to disclose to the court and to his co-tenants that the realty is selling below its actual value, and his receiving an additional compensation to remain silent and allow confirmation has been treated as fraud.⁴ After the interest in common has once fairly ended, the former co-owners owe no more duty to each other than to any other persons.⁵ It has been held that the omission of a tenant in common to disclose the existence of extrinsic facts affecting the value of the land held in common as his omission to disclose the existence of oil on other land⁶ is not fraud.

A guardian occupies relations of trust and confidence toward his ward.¹ During the continuance of the guardianship contracts between guardian and ward are voidable at the ward's election because of his disability² as well as on the ground of constructive fraud. So if A, who is in a relation of personal trust to B, a guardian, obtains funds of B's ward, C, A is held as trustee for C.³ Such a contract may be ratified by the ward after acquiring full legal capacity.⁴ In a judicial proceeding in which the ward was represented by a guardian ad litem and the interests of the regular guardian and the ward were openly adverse, the guardian may by force of the decree acquire an interest adverse to that of the ward.⁵ A guardian cannot acquire the property of his ward at his own sale, without disclosing his identity and obtaining the ward's consent, after the ward has full capacity to contract.⁶ So a guardian to whom his ward gave a power of attorney before he was appointed guardian, cannot sell to himself under such power.⁷ So a sale by the guardian to her husband may be set aside at the application of the ward, even after confirmation, though the full price of the property was paid and no actual fraud existed.⁸ So a guardian cannot acquire any interest in the ward's property adverse to the interest of the ward.⁹ If the guardian buys a claim against the estate, he cannot charge the ward's estate with more than he actually paid for such claim.¹⁰ Even if he discloses his identity he must furthermore make full and complete disclosure to the ward of all material facts.¹¹ Thus omission of a guardian to disclose the ward's property to the ward is constructive fraud, and avoids the contract.¹² Such contract must furthermore be fair and reasonable.¹³ The same principles apply to transactions after the relationship has terminated, but while the influence, trust and confidence continue.¹⁴ After the guardianship has terminated and the ward has acquired full contractual capacity, the relations of trust and confidence are presumed to continue for a while; and contracts between the parties,¹⁵ whether before¹⁶ or after¹⁷ the settlement between them are constructively fraudulent unless it is shown affirmatively that the transaction was fair, and upon full disclosure of all material facts. Thus contracts for the purchase or sale of property,¹⁸ or a contract settling the account of the guardian and releasing him from liability,¹⁹ are held to be presumptively fraudulent if entered into soon after the termination of the guardianship. A gift by a ward to the guardian is prima facie fraudulent.²⁰ A contract between guardian and ward made after full disclosure and with independent advice,²¹ or acquiesced in for a considerable time with full knowledge of the facts,²² is valid. A sale after the guardianship has terminated, upon full disclosure of all material facts, and at the full market value, cannot be avoided because the value soon afterwards has greatly increased.²³

A trustee cannot, without the consent of the beneficiaries, acquire an interest in the trust property. If he attempts to do so without disclosing his identity and obtaining their consent, he is still held as trustee,¹ even if he pays a fair and adequate price therefor.² Thus a trust company cannot buy at its own sale as trustee.³ The trustee cannot make profit for himself out of the trust estate.⁴ If the trustee discloses his identity and obtains the consent of the beneficiaries to his acquiring interests in the trust property, he must make full and complete disclosure of all material facts, and must make a fair and reasonable contract with the beneficiaries. If he makes such full disclosure and reasonable contract, the beneficiaries are bound by their agreement.⁵ Even after the trusteeship has ended the former trustee can acquire an interest in the trust property from the beneficiary only on full disclosure of material facts.⁶ Where under such circumstances the trustee bought trust property after the termination of the trust without disclosing to the beneficiary the existence of mines thereon and for a price inadequate in view of the existence of such mines, the sale was set aside.⁷ In matters outside the trust, the trustee and beneficiary may deal with each other as with parties not in confidential relations.⁸ Thus a trustee of one tract may buy the interest of the beneficiaries in a distinct tract at execution sale;⁹ and one who is trustee of one undivided half and owner of the other in his own right may, to protect his own interests, buy at partition sale.¹⁰

§188. Executors and administrators.

An executor or administrator who buys property of the estate at his own sale, without the consent of the persons beneficially interested therein and without disclosing his identity to them, is guilty of constructive fraud.¹ If, however, the lien of the executor on the decedent's realty existed before his appointment as executor, as where a mortgatee,² or judgment creditor,³ is made executor and buys in the property covered by the lien no fraud exists. An administrator cannot, in his official capacity, give a mortgage to himself in his individual capacity.⁴ The consent of the beneficiaries in advance to such sale,⁵ or their ratification of such sale,⁶ or their laches after the sale in setting such sale aside,⁷ may keep them from avoiding it. An executrix cannot make secret profit against the heirs.⁸ If an executor buys in claims against the estate and charges the estate only what he paid for them he is not guilty of constructive fraud.⁹ If the executor discloses his identity and the contract is fair and reasonable, the executor may deal with the beneficiaries with reference to the estate.¹⁰ While an executor does not necessarily occupy such a relation of trust toward the heirs as to prevent him from dealing with them at arm's length for their interest in the estate of which he is in charge, when he discloses his adverse interest he may assume a special fiduciary relationship. Thus if the administrator agrees with his cousin, the sole heir, a non-resident, to act for her interests, and urges her not to employ an attorney, he assumes a fiduciary relation and must make full disclosure of all the material facts.¹¹ separate advantage out of transactions between them without the consent of the other. Thus a husband and wife deeded property in trust to secure a debt of the husband's. After the wife's death the husband bought the property at a sale for such debt. He was held a trustee for his wife's heirs as to her share.² A post-nuptial contract which is disadvantageous to the wife is presumptively fraudulent³ and if the husband or those claiming under him wish to uphold such contract it is for them to show the absence of fraud.⁴ In cases of gratuitous transfers by a wife to a husband, especially if under circumstances of suspicion,⁵ as where the transfer is made shortly before her death,⁶ fraud is presumed to exist unless the husband shows affirmatively that no fraud existed. No presumption of fraud arises in conveyances from the husband to the wife.⁷ If the wife is in fact guilty of taking an unfair advantage of her husband,⁸ as in procuring the substitution of her name for his as grantee in a deed conveying property paid for by the husband which he intended to have conveyed to himself,⁹ such transaction may be avoided by the husband or those claiming under him. Under the California statute, a wife who seeks specific performance against her husband of a contract entered into between them to induce her to dismiss a proceeding for divorce as well as an action against him on notes which she claims to hold against him, must show that such contract is fair in order to have such relief.¹⁰

Persons under contract to intermarry stand in confidential relations to each other,¹ and must ordinarily make full disclosure to each other of material facts affecting contracts entered into between them affecting their property.² The exact extent to which the prospective husband must make full disclosure to his prospective wife of his property in an ante-nuptial contract concerning their property rights is a question upon which the courts have not always expressed the same views. In some cases it has been said that if the prospective husband does not make full disclosure of the nature, character and amount of his property, the ante-nuptial contract must be set aside.³ In other cases, it seems to be held that if the prospective husband is not guilty of intentional or fraudulent concealment, the contract may be valid though the prospective wife does not have full information as to the extent of his property or as to her prospective legal rights therein.⁴ In order to uphold such a contract it must be shown to be fair.⁵ If unfair and unreasonable it will be set aside,⁶ and especially will specific performance be refused where such inadequate contract is signed without being read,⁷ or where it is shown that the intended wife does not understand the nature of the rights that she is surrendering,⁸ or the character of the instrument that she is signing.⁹ If it is not shown that the provision was inadequate when the contract was entered into, subsequent increase in the husband's property cannot make it invalid.¹⁰ A contract making an inadequate provision will be upheld if entered into by the prospective wife voluntarily and with full knowledge of the facts.¹¹ The question whether a provision is adequate or not does not depend solely upon the extent of the husband's estate. The financial condition of the wife before marriage is also to be considered.¹² It may be shown that, as a matter of fact, no especial trust and confidence existed between the parties to an ante-nuptial contract with reference thereto, but that the prospective wife relied on independent advice.¹³ With reference to the contract to intermarry in the future as distinguished from the ante-nuptial contract fixing their property rights, the woman is bound to disclose her prior unchastity with other men.¹⁴ She is not bound to make disclosure as to other facts,¹⁵ but if she makes any disclosure as to such facts it must be fair and not misleading.¹⁶ This last rule has of course no application to contracts performed by the intermarriage of the parties.

The relation of parent and child is one of trust and confidence. Transactions between parents and children but slightly past the age of majority are sharply scrutinized by the courts.¹ It has been held that even if advantageous to the parent, fraud and undue influence are not presumed if the child is of full age.²

² Mallow v. Walker, 115 Ia. 238;

A gratuitous deed made by one who is just of age to one in loco parentis has been held not to be prima facie voidable for constructive fraud.³ So where a daughter a few months after arriving at majority deeded to her mother her interest in her deceased father's estate at the request of her mother, it having been largely accumulated by the efforts of her mother, it was held that there was no constructive fraud.⁴ Such contracts must be made with "uberrima fides, that fulness of candor and fairness required in transactions between parent and child."⁵ Misrepresentations which between parties not in confidential relations would fall far short of fraud⁶ or suspicious circumstances attending the transaction⁷ may amount to constructive fraud.⁸ So if in reliance upon the parent, the children convey to him under an unenforceable oral contract, as a contract by him not to convey the property away, but to manage it during his life-time;⁹ or a contract to destroy the conveyance and thus keep it from the record and never to make use of it,¹⁰ breach of such contract may amount to constructive fraud. Conveyances, gifts, and other transactions advantageous to the child are not presumed to be caused by fraud but to be by way of advancement.¹¹ If the child is shown to have actual influence and control over the parent, the burden may rest on the child to explain suspicious circumstances. A conveyance by parent to child under an executory contract, as under a contract by him to sell for their benefit¹² may be avoided in case of breach, on the theory of constructive fraud.

§192. Mortgagor and mortgagee.

In making the contract and conveyance whereby they enter upon the relation of mortgagor and mortgagee the parties usually deal at arm's length, no especial trust and confidence being reposed by either in the other. It is impossible, however, for them to make a valid contract contemporaneous with the giving of the mortgage whereby the right to redeem is waived.¹ So a contract where the mortgagor agrees that while the mortgage is in force he will sell no malt liquor on the premises except such as is bought from the mortgagee is invalid as tending to clog the equity of redemption.² On account of the advantage possessed by the mortgagee and the necessities of the mortgagor, subsequent contracts waiving the right of redemption are sharply scrutinized.³ "Contracts between the mortgagor and the mortgagee for the purchase or extinguishment of the equity of redemption are always regarded with jealousy by courts of equity,"⁴ and if unfair,⁵ as for an inadequate consideration,⁶ or if induced by the mortgagee's denial of the mortgagor's right to redeem and his refusal to assent to the correction of a mistake

No relations of trust and confidence exist between debtor and creditor as such. Hence omission by a debtor whose debt was payable when a specified claim is collected, to disclose the fact that such claim was collected,¹ or the denial by a debtor bank of liability upon a lost certificate of deposit,² are none of them such fraud as to prevent the running of the statute of limitations. So omission of a debtor bank to disclose to the representatives of a depositor the existence of the deposit is not such fraud as to charge the bank with interest.³ It has been held that where payee sent a note for collection to an attorney who had personally assumed it, omission by such attorney to disclose his liability was held not fraud.⁴

§194. Actual trust and confidence.

It is not necessary, however, that any technical relations of trust should exist to make concealment operate as fraud. If confidence is in fact known to both parties to be reposed, as where one is a son-in-law of the other party,¹ or where without any relationship, one party knows that the other relies on his judgment,² omission to disclose material facts is a constructive fraud. So, omission by a priest to disclose his parishioner

III. WHAT FACTS MAY AMOUNT TO CONSTRUCTIVE FRAUD.

Matters of opinion cannot be the basis of false statements in actual fraud. Between persons occupying relations of trust and confidence, a false statement as to matters of opinion may constitute constructive fraud.¹ Thus as between principal and agent,² or partners,³ or a promoter of a corporation and a stockholder,⁴ or a president of a corporation and a stockholder⁵ constructive fraud may exist through a false statement of what is strictly a matter of opinion. Where no technical relations of trust and confidence exist, but trust and confidence are actually reposed, a false statement of an opinion may amount to constructive fraud.⁶ Accordingly if the parties are not on an equality, as where the opinion relied on is that of an expert,⁷

So a statement of opinion by one who knows that the party to whom it is made has not the means of determining the question, but must and does rely on the opinion thus expressed, can be fraud.¹⁰ So the expression of an opinion or a statement of the value of property made to one who has not the means of ascertaining the facts, and is known to rely on such statement of value is fraud.¹¹ So if the party to whom such statements are made is mentally deficient, though not insane or idiotic, a statement of opinion may be constructive fraud.¹²

In some jurisdictions a statement of the price paid for an article is held not to be such a statement of fact as can amount to actual fraud. Between persons in confidential relations a false statement as to the price paid is constructive fraud. Such a misstatement may constitute fraud as between principal and agent.¹ A misstatement by an agent to his principal of the price for which he has bought property for the principal, overstating the price,² or of the price for which he sells his principal's property, understating the price,³ constitutes constructive fraud. By such conduct the agent forfeits his right to his commissions, as where he charges the principal an excessive price for property which he buys as agent,⁴ or where he sells property for his principal at a price agreed upon by his principal, failing to disclose a better offer.⁵ So a false statement by a promoter to the other members of the association as to the price paid for property may constitute constructive fraud.⁶ Constructive fraud between co-owners merges into actual fraud where one co-owner buys for all, and misrepresents the price, thereby causing the remaining co-owners to pay more than their share of the purchase money while he pays less.⁷ Accordingly if one of several co-owners, who acts for the rest, mistates to them the price at which the property in question has been bought or sold by him on behalf of such principal, or co-owner, thereby inducing them to pay more or to take less for their property, constructive or actual fraud exists.⁸ So if a husband, acting on an understanding with the grantee, mistates to his wife the price received for the homestead, whereby she is induced to release her interest therein,⁹ misstatement as to cost constitutes fraud.

§197. Value.

A statement as to value, as distinguished from price, is very generally held to be a mere expression of opinion. As between persons in confidential relations, however, an expression of opinion as to value may, if intended to deceive, amount to constructive fraud. A statement of value made by an attorney to his client may amount to fraud; as a false statement by an attorney to an ignorant client as to the value of his inheritance, the probable amount of attorney's fees and the retention of all the other attorneys in town by the opposite party.¹ Representations as to value do not constitute fraud though made between parties whose relation is such as to be usually classed as one of trust and confidence, if no confidence is in fact reposed. So a contract between persons about to intermarry, in which the woman did not rely on the representations of her prospective husband but on the advice and judgment of her son, is not subject to the ordinary rules of confidential relations.²

§198. False statement of law.

A statement as to a matter of law is ordinarily not such a statement of fact as amounts to actual fraud. Between persons in confidential relations, however, a false statement as to a matter of law may amount to constructive fraud. A mistake, or misrepresentation of law, as between attorney and client may be a ground for avoiding a transaction.¹ Thus A, a client, conveyed realty to B, his attorney, in order to secure for A a more advantageous settlement from his wife. A did not know the power of the attorney with reference to a reconveyance. It was held that after A and his wife had resumed marital relations, A might have reconveyance on account of such mistake.² So a false statement of law made by an executor to the heirs may be ground for avoiding a transaction induced thereby, where there is actual trust and confidence reposed.³ Thus if an heir is induced to consent to a redivision of her father's estate less advantageous to her than the interest given to her by his will, through the false statement made by the executor that unless she consented to such redivision the property would have to be sold, such conveyance will be canceled by the court of equity.⁴ So a false statement of law made by a husband to his wife may amount to constructive fraud. Thus where a husband falsely represented to his wife that she was liable on certain debts, and thus induced her to convey her property to him to defraud her creditors, it was held that constructive fraud existed, that they were not on equal terms and that she might have cancellation.⁵ A false statement as to a matter of law may be the means of perpetrating constructive fraud where actual trust and confidence is in fact reposed, even if no technical relationship exists between the parties. If A enters into a contract under mistake of law in the inducement, and B is guilty of inequitable conduct with reference to such mistake A may have rescission. Thus, if B knows of A's mistake and takes advantage thereof,⁶ or if B, by concealing the truth, confirms A in his mistake,⁷ or if A's mistake is due to B's misrepresentation⁸ A may have rescission. Thus, where after loss the agent of the insurance company represented to the insured that his policy was void as because insured was not the sole owner,⁹ or because the property insured was encumbered by liens¹⁰ and thereby induced a compromise, the insured is allowed rescission. So where A entered into a mutual assessment fire insurance company on the representation of the officers and other members that the premium note given by him is the limit of his liability, he cannot on the insolvency of the company be made to pay the statutory liability necessary to pay the losses.¹¹ So where A who was not a man of strong mind, was residing on Indian lands as tenant of B, at a time when a statute was passed giving the occupant of such lands the first right to purchase them at a fixed price, and A, being under the influence of B and B's agent C, was led to believe that B, of whom he was holding, had the legal right to make such purchase, and accordingly agreed to convey his right to B for less than a fifteenth of its real value, A was allowed to avoid such agreement on learning that he had the legal right to make such purchase.¹² So if a quit-claim deed is given by a mortgagee to a mortgagor, not knowing that it discharged the mortgage, cancellation of such quit-claim deed may be had in equity.¹³ So an agreement to give a release to the children of a devisee who had died before testator may be avoided as to the executory part thereof if entered into because the promisor did not know that the death of the devisee before the testator caused the devise to lapse.¹⁴ It must be admitted that the results reached in some of these cases are contrary to those reached in others on substantially similar facts.¹⁵ The doctrine of constructive fraud is invoked in some cases, while in others it is held that the parties were really dealing at arm's length and that no trust or confidence was or should have been reposed. Thus it was held that rescission could not be had where grantor voluntarily conveyed a right of way, not knowing that such conveyance prevented him from recovering damages caused to the rest of his property by the use of such right of way; even though the grantee knew of such mistake and did not advise grantor of the effect of the deed.¹⁶ The views expressed in some of the cases are a relic of the doctrine originally entertained by the English courts of equity; namely that if one acting in ignorance of a known and established principle of the Common Law should convey property, equity would presume fraud or undue influence, and so would grant relief.¹⁷

In some jurisdictions a person who signs a written instrument in ignorance of its contents, but with an opportunity to read it and without reasonable excuse for omitting to read it, cannot avoid the instrument even if the adversary party misrepresented its contents and effect.¹ Even between parties not in confidential relations there is much authority for the better rule, that such fraud prevents any contract from ever existing.² As between persons in confidential relations the rule first given has no application.³ If a wife, in reliance upon her husband, executes an instrument such as an assignment of insurance⁴ or a deed⁵ the contents and nature of which she does not understand, and which conveys her rights contrary to her understanding of the transaction, fraud exists. Thus if an aunt, in whom her nephews repose great confidence, induces them to execute a deed conveying realty to her, by representing to them that it merely authorizes her to collect rents, they may avoid it even if they have signed it without reading it.⁶ Even between persons in confidential relations, fraud in the execution does not exist by reason of a failure of the promisor to attend to the terms of a written contract which the promisor read, or which was read correctly to him. The relationship of parent and child does not excuse the parent for failure to give due attention to the terms of a written contract which is read over to her correct and executed by her; and she cannot avoid such contract.⁷

A breach of contract is ordinarily not fraud.¹ Between persons in confidential relations, if the contract is one of the means whereby the particular confidence is obtained and the breach the means whereby it is betrayed, it may amount to fraud.² Thus if property is conveyed by a principal to an agent for use under his agency³ a breach of the contract of agency may be treated as a constructive fraud. So if A delivers money to B under a contract whereby B agrees to pay a judgment against A, and B does not pay such judgment, but allows A's property to be sold on execution and buys it in, using A's money and some of B's money for that purpose, B acquires no title to such property as against A.⁴ A mere breach of contract by B to buy for A at a judicial sale is held not to be fraud.⁵ A breach of contract may amount to fraud as between parties in the confidential relation of husband and wife, "independent of any element of actual fraud."⁶ Thus if a husband conveys to his wife to avoid making a will, so that she may enjoy the property in case of his death, and she has agreed to reconvey whenever he wishes, a breach of such contract is constructive fraud.⁷ So if a husband agrees to hold realty for his wife's brothers, and thus induces her not to make a will leaving such realty to them, his breach of such contract is constructive fraud.⁸ So between parties in relations of actual, though not technical, trust and confidence, a breach of a contract induced by such trust, as of a contract to reconvey, whereby the promisee was induced to convey to the promisor⁹ may amount to fraud. The practical importance of this question arises out of the fact that in most of cases the contract itself is unenforceable for some reason, often because of the statute of frauds; while if breach of the contract is treated as fraud, the party in default can be held as trustee under a constructive trust.

CHAPTER XII.

UNDUE INFLUENCE.

I. GENERAL NATURE OF DOCTRINE.

§201. Nature of undue influence.

It has become the established doctrine, according to the weight of authority at Modern Law, that the test for duress is not whether a courageous man, or even a man of ordinary firmness, would have been overpowered by the duress, but whether the specific individual against whom the duress was exerted was in fact overpowered.¹ So in fraud the modern tendency is to hold that the test for fraud is not whether the representation would have deceived a man of unusual shrewdness, or whether it would have deceived a man of ordinary shrewdness, but whether it did deceive the specific individual who is made the victim of such fraud.² The application and extension of this doctrine results in the doctrine of undue influence.

Undue influence may be presumed where the evidence shows that the parties to the transaction occupied certain confidential relations.³ Other facts may strengthen this presumption, or, existing in combination, may, without the aid of such presumption, establish the fact of undue influence.⁴ Of these facts the most important are the following: (1) A weakness of mind which amounts to a technical incapacity, makes the transaction voidable, and if proven, eliminates the question of undue influence.⁵ Weakness of mind not amounting to technical incapacity, is an important element in connection with other facts in establishing the existence of undue influence. (2) A mis-

statement of fact which amounts to fraud, or in some jurisdictions to misrepresentation, makes the contract voidable. If such fraud or misrepresentation is proved, the question of the additional existence of undue influence is ordinarily immaterial. A misstatement which falls short of technical fraud, such as a misrepresentation of law, may be an important element in establishing the fact of undue influence.⁶ (3) Non-disclosure may in certain specific cases, make the contract voidable.⁷ In other cases, however, which do not fall within any of the recognized classes, non-disclosure may, in connection with other facts, serve to establish the existence of undue influence.⁸ (4) Inadequacy of consideration does not destroy the validity of a contract, if there is a thing of value as consideration, and there is no fraud, misrepresentation or mistake.⁹ In connection with other facts, inadequacy of consideration is an important element in determining whether undue influence exists.¹⁰ (5) The circumstances of oppression which amount to technical duress will be discussed.¹¹ However, circumstances of oppression short of duress, and not of themselves avoiding the contract, may, in connection with other facts, be important as establishing the presence of undue influence.¹²

§202. Some influence must exist.

To constitute undue influence, there must be influence of some sort exerted upon the person who seeks relief.¹ In the absence of influence exerted by another, undue influence cannot be said to exist.² A conveyance by a grantor of weak mind who is shown to be the active agent in the transaction is not caused by undue influence.³

§203. Influence exerted must overpower the will.

A contract or conveyance may be caused by the influence of the adversary party without being caused by undue influence.¹ Thus solicitation and importunity,² suggestion and advice,³ appeals to the reason and conviction of the party influenced,⁴ and appeals to the emotions or affections,⁵ while all forms of influence are not necessarily undue influence. Even the fact that the importunity is urgent,⁶ that it is accompanied by tears,⁷ or that it subjects the grantor to vexation and annoyance,⁸ does not establish the fact that the influence was undue. To what degree influence must extend to be termed undue is a question stated in the abstract by the courts in varying terms. It has been said that the influence must be such as to deprive the party of free agency,⁹ that it must overcome his will,¹⁰ that it must render his act the offspring of another's will,¹¹ or that he must stand in vinculis.¹² So it has been said that, to be undue, the influence must cause him to do something which he would not have done had he been allowed to exercise his own free judgment.¹³

Undue influence has been said to consist of compulsion insufficient to constitute technical duress.¹ The same idea, differently expressed is that "duress is but the extreme of undue influence."² Undue influence has been said to be distinguishable from duress in being only a social, moral or domestic force.³ Facts which in most States would be held to amount to duress are said in others to avoid the contract for undue influence.⁴ Thus where a married woman signed a contract for her separate maintenance and a release of her dower and homestead rights because while sick she had been treated by her husband in a cruel manner, locked in her room, and finally taken to a strange place and ordered to sign, it was said that the contract was voidable because she signed under an undue influence which amounted to a moral duress.⁵ A contract or conveyance induced by threats of criminal prosecution, either of the party or of those in near relations to him, is said in many States to be induced by duress.⁶ On the other hand such facts have been said not to amount to duress, but to undue influence.⁷

Thus contracts, mortgages and the like caused by a threatened arrest of the party himself,⁸ or of a son,⁹ or a husband¹⁰ have been held voidable on the ground of undue influence.

§205. Relation of undue influence to fraud.

Undue influence has on the other hand been classed as "a species of fraud."¹ So it has been said to be not fraud, but like fraud.² The type of fraud referred to is, of course, constructive fraud and not actual fraud. It must be admitted that while certain types of constructive fraud can be distinguished clearly from undue influence, there are other forms of constructive fraud which blend into undue influence, and which render the division between the two an arbitrary one, made chiefly for convenience in discussion, and not controlled by principle.

Whether undue influence exists in a particular case is a question of fact.¹ Accordingly many cases exist in which similar facts as to the compulsion used, the situation of the parties and the like, produce opposite results because in some case falls rather within the equitable principle which renders voidable contracts obtained by undue influence." Adams v. Bank, 116 N. Y. 606; 15 Am. St. Rep. 447; 6 L. R. A. 491; 23 N. E. 7.

cases it appears as a fact that the mind of the party who seeks relief was overpowered, while in others it appears as a fact that it was not. For this reason, it is often impossible to make any exact statement of what degree of constraint is necessary to cause undue influence: since the existence of undue influence, where it is found to exist, is determined by the court as a question of fact in each particular case.

In most of the cases arising under undue influence the influence is exerted by the party who receives the benefit of the transaction. It is not necessary, however, that a personal advantage should be obtained by the person who exercises the undue influence. If the beneficiary either does not part with anything of value under the transaction complained of¹ or has notice of the existence of the undue influence, the transaction may be avoided though the influence exerted was that of a third person not acting for or representing the beneficiary. Thus A deposited money with a corporation as a loan. Subsequently he was induced by undue influence to give an order transferring such money to a fund held by such corporation for religious purposes. It was held that A's executor could recover such fund from the corporation.² A different rule obtains if adversary to the transaction complained of, parts with value thereunder without notice of the existence of undue influence. Undue influence exerted by a husband to induce his wife to sign a mortgage does not avoid the instrument if the mortgagee did not know of such undue influence and gave value for such security.³

II. PRESUMPTIVE INFLUENCE.

§208. Presumptions of undue influence.

Undue influence is said, in most jurisdictions to be presumed in transactions between persons in confidential relations

whereby an advantage is gained by the person who holds the dominating situation.¹ The confidential relations thus involved are the same as those considered under constructive fraud; and in the same cases as those in which a presumption of constructive fraud is said to arise, a presumption of undue influence is said to exist.² This presumption is prima facie only. A transaction between persons in actual relations of trust and confidence, will be upheld if it is the expression of the genuine and untrammelled assent of the parties seeking relief.³ This is especially true if the person in whom the trust is reposed gains no advantage by the transaction. Thus a conveyance by A, in contemplation of marriage to B, her confidential adviser, in trust for A, raises no presumption of undue influence.⁴

¹ Thomas v. Whitney, 186 Ill. 225; 57 N. E. 808; Dunn v. Dunn, 42 N. J. Eq. 431; 7 Atl. 842; Doyle v. Welch, 100 Wis. 24; 75 N. W. 400. "Undue influence, which is a species of fraud, when relied upon to annul a transaction inter partes, or a testamentary disposition, must be proved, and cannot be presumed. But the relation in which the parties to a transaction stand to each other is often a material circumstance, and may of itself, in some cases, be sufficient to raise a presumption of its existence. Transactions between guardian and ward, attorney and client, trustee and cestui que trust, or persons one of whom is dependent upon and subject to the control of the other, are illustrations of this doctrine. Dealings between parties thus situated, resulting in a benefit conferred upon, or an advantage gained by the one holding the dominating situation, naturally excite suspicion, and when the situation is shown, then there is cast upon the party claiming the benefit or advantage, the burden of relieving himself from the suspicion thus engendered, and of showing, either by direct proof

or by circumstances, that the transaction was free from fraud or undue influence, and that the other party acted without restraint and under no coercion, or any pressure direct or indirect, of the party benefited. This rule does not proceed upon a presumption of the invalidity of the particular transaction, without proof. The proof is made in the first instance when the relation and the personal intervention of the party claiming the benefit is shown. The law is not so impracticable as to refuse to take notice of the influence of greed and selfishness upon human conduct, and in the case supposed it wisely interposes by adjusting the quality and measure of proof to the circumstances, to protect the weaker party and, as far as may be, to make it certain that trust and confidence have not been perverted or abused." In re Smith, 95 N. Y. 516, 522; quoted in Barnard v. Gantz, 140 N. Y. 249, 257; 35 N. E. 430.

⁴ Falk v. Turner, 101 Mass. 494.

In transactions between persons in confidential relations, whereby an advantage is acquired by a person who does not hold the dominating relation, as in transfers by a husband to wife,⁵ or by a parent to a child,⁶ the fact that the consideration is inadequate does not, of itself, establish undue influence.

§209. Illustrations of confidential relations.—Parent and child.

A transaction between parent and child, resulting in a benefit to the parent creates a presumption of undue influence.¹ The Supreme Court of the United States has held, contrary to the weight of authority, that no presumption of undue influence arises in such cases,² though circumstances showing compulsion as a fact may establish undue influence.³ No presumption of undue influence arises in case of a gift by the parent to the child, or other transaction resulting in a benefit to the child.⁴ There is even a negative presumption in cases of gifts from parent to child, and undue influence has been held not to exist where, owing to the feeble condition of the parent, undue influence would be held to exist had the transaction existed between persons not so related.⁵ A conveyance by a husband to his wife, and a reconveyance by her to their children does not beneficiaries.⁶ Somewhat similar principles apply to conveyances to apparent heirs. Thus a conveyance to a nephew will raise a presumption of undue influence on the part of the be upheld, if fair and reasonable,⁷ as where the nephew has, under such contract, come from a different State at considerable expense, and has expended a considerable sum in improving his aunt's house,⁸ or has, under such contract supported such uncle.⁹ So a surrender by a grandmother to her grandsons of notes held by her against them is not prima facie caused by undue influence.¹⁰ So a contract of sale by an uncle to his nephew with whom he is in confidential business relations is not presumptively caused by undue influence.¹¹

A presumption of undue influence arises in transactions between guardian and ward, even after the ward has attained legal capacity, resulting in benefit to the guardian,¹ and this presumption may be sufficient to establish undue influence if it does not appear that the ward acts under independent advice.² The fact that the price paid was more than was offered by a third person, and that the ward was determined to sell, does not prevent undue influence from existing if the consideration was grossly inadequate.³ So a son who has in fact been acting as guardian of his parents is guilty of undue influence if he induces them to give him a mortgage by making excessive claims for amounts due from them to him. In such a case the son is bound to "deal fairly and frankly and to take no advantage."⁴

A transaction between a husband and a wife resulting in a benefit to the husband, creates a presumption of undue influence.¹ In order to create this presumption, the transaction must be intended to benefit the husband. A contract by a wife to convey to a husband, in pursuance of an agreement by him to devise his property to her, so that the survivor should have all the property, does not raise the presumption of undue influence.² The rule that a transaction between husband and wife resulting in a benefit to the husband creates a presumption of undue influence has been put in statutory form,³ and has been so broadened by statute that it includes transactions resulting in an advantage to the wife.⁴

A transaction between principal and agent, if advantageous to the agent, will be scrutinized closely.¹ If the transaction, however, concerns a subject-matter which is outside of and unconnected with the agency, no presumption of undue influence arises.²

A transaction between physician and patient resulting in benefit to the physician creates a presumption of undue influence.¹ This presumption is peculiarly strong if the patient is in the physician's custody.² Similar principles apply to transactions between nurse and patient advantageous to the nurse.³ However if influence is exerted by the physician for the good of the patient and not for his own advantage, the presumption of undue influence does not arise.⁴ Such presumption is of course not conclusive, and it may be shown that the transaction was fair and honest.⁵

A transaction between a religious adviser and a member of his parish or congregation advantageous to such adviser is generally held to be presumptively due to undue influence.¹ A transaction between a spiritualistic medium and a believer in his powers resulting in benefit to the medium creates a presumption of undue influence.²

§216. Actual confidence without technical relation.

Trust and confidence may in fact exist though the parties occupy no technical relations to each other.¹ Between persons in such relations, and in transactions advantageous to the person occupying the dominant situation, undue influence will be presumed to exist.²

No presumption of undue influence arises where a relation of trust and confidence had once existed between the parties, but such relation had been dissolved for a considerable period of time.¹ A conveyance to a physician who had professional charge of the grantor two months before the transaction and four months afterward, but at no time between, does not raise such presumption.² The mere fact of the relation of master and servant, or landlord and boarder, does not of itself raise any presumption of undue influence, since confidential relations cannot be assumed to exist in such cases.³

III. COMBINATIONS OF CONSTRAINT.

§218. Confidential relationship and weakness of mind.

The question of undue influence between persons in confidential relations is rarely settled by the bare presumption arising out of such relations. Additional facts either strengthen or rebut the presumption of undue influence. If, in addition to the confidential relationship between the parties, a person who reposes trust and confidence in the other is afflicted with weakness,¹ either physical,² or mental,³ such fact greatly strengthens the presumption of undue influence arising out of the confidential relations between the parties. Examples of cases in which undue influence has been held to exist under this combination of facts are given in the note below.⁴ An assignment by a wife, who has recently been released from an insane asylum, of an insurance policy held by her on her husband's life, to their child, at his instance without understanding its effect has been held to be due prima facie to undue influence.⁵ Between persons in a confidential relation, the fact that the party seeking relief was aged and infirm, and that he was induced to enter into the transaction by a contract which had not been performed, still further strengthens the presumption of undue influence.⁶ This combination of facts does not necessarily establish the existence of undue influence.

§219. Confidential relationship and misrepresentation.

In addition to a confidential relationship between the parties, the further fact of a misstatement, even if not amounting to technical fraud, or the additional fact of circumstances of oppression, not amounting to technical duress, or the combination of both misstatement and oppression, tend greatly to strengthen the presumption of undue influence. Thus a conveyance by a weak, timid woman, who does not understand the legal effect of her deed, to her sister,¹ a conveyance by a woman who does not understand the effect of her deed, to keep her husband, from whom she separated, away from her home, made to her brother, who is her confidential adviser,² a conveyance to a parent made by a young woman about to be married, on her father's representation that her future husband was actuated by mercenary motives and that this would be an excellent test of his affection, the effect of the deed not being explained to her,³ a conveyance by a daughter to her mother, under whose influence she was, made gratuitously in order to obtain the mother's consent to the daughter's marriage to a man with whom the daughter had been criminally intimate, the conveyance being made by reason of her mother's representation that the daughter had only a fourth interest in her grandfather's estate, whereas she had a half interest; and also by her mother's representation that if she did not convey it, it would be taken for her husband's debts,⁴ and a conveyance made by niece to her uncle of her interest in her grandfather's estate for half its value, she knowing nothing of its value and her uncle being advised of all the facts,⁵ have each been set aside on the ground of undue influence.

§220. Confidential relationship and non-disclosure.

In addition to the foregoing facts, the further fact that the party holding the dominating position in the confidential relation has failed to make disclosure of the material facts, still further strengthens the presumption of undue influence.¹ The same result follows if material facts are misstated, even if not in such form as to amount to technical fraud.²

§221. Weakness of mind.

If the party seeking relief is weak mentally, the transaction of which he complains will be scrutinized carefully, and if any ground for believing that undue influence has been acquired over him exists, the transaction will be set aside.¹ The fact of mental distress,² or of solicitation even of a person of weak intellect,³ do not of themselves establish undue influence. The mere fact, moreover, that a party to the transaction is weak mentally, but not so weak as to amount to a legal incapacity to make contracts or conveyances, is not of itself sufficient to justify the court in setting aside the contract or conveyance in the absence of further evidence.⁴ Weakness of mind may, however, when combined with inadequacy of consideration, be sufficient to show that the influence exercised over the party was undue.⁵

§222. Weakness of mind and misrepresentation.

Weakness of mind, together with misstatement, even if not amounting to technical fraud,¹ such as a representation by a third person acting in collusion with the grantee that her brother would buy the property taken in exchange at a great advance,² or a false statement that a life-estate was reserved to grantor's wife in the deed,³ or a false statement of the value of property;⁴ or circumstances of oppression, even if not amounting to technical duress,⁵ as where a helpless and bed-ridden grantor is threatened by grantee with desertion,⁶ or the combination of misrepresentation and circumstances of oppression,⁷ may be sufficient to establish the fact of undue influence.

§223. Misrepresentation of law and actual influence.

A misrepresentation of law is not ordinarily treated as technical fraud.¹ However, a misrepresentation of law may be so combined with the exercise of influence over the party seeking relief, as to establish the fact of undue influence.² Thus a misrepresentation of law, even if innocent, as that a lease for life to take effect in the future is void, the lessee being thus induced to compromise for a sum far less than her interest in her father's estate,³ may in connection with facts of undue influence make the transaction voidable.

§224. What constitutes inadequacy of consideration.

Whether a consideration is adequate or not depends very largely on the circumstances of each particular case. No arbitrary rule as to the percentage of the actual value that must be paid to constitute an adequate consideration can be laid down. To give some specific examples, keeping in view the fact that often the other circumstances of weakness of mind, confidence and trust, oppression and the like are after all decisive in each particular case: the consideration has been held inadequate where five dollars was paid for realty worth one thousand dollars;¹ where five hundred dollars was paid for realty worth eight thousand dollars;² where fifty dollars was paid for land worth five hundred dollars;³ and where nearly five hundred dollars was charged for the trouble of endorsing an insurance policy.⁴ A conveyance made by a spendthrift, of his life estate in property worth two thousand dollars, for fifty dollars, has been avoided in equity.⁵ So where A borrowed about two thousand five hundred dollars by a transaction whereby in addition to the principal and interest, he was to pay nearly twelve thousand dollars for land not worth six thousand dollars, the consideration was held to be so inadequate that the contract was unconscionable.⁶

A conveyance of all the grantor's property in consideration of a contract for future support cannot be said to be on so inadequate a consideration as to be unconscionable.⁷ If an annuity for life is part of the consideration, the question of adequacy depends in part on the expectancy of life of the annuitant if the annuity exceeds the annual income from the property. If the annuity is less than annual income, inadequacy to some extent is there manifest. Hence the expectancy of life of the annuitant may be considered in determining whether the consideration is inadequate.⁸ A conveyance of property worth twenty thousand dollars in return for the assumption of a mortgage for four thousand dollars, giving a note for five thousand dollars and agreeing to pay an annuity of six hundred dollars a year for the life of a woman then over seventy was held to be on inadequate consideration.⁹ So a conveyance of property worth from six to eight thousand dollars in consideration of a cash payment of two hundred and fifty dollars; and an agreement to pay an annuity of five hundred dollars and all doctor's bills for the life of a woman between sixty and seventy, in very poor health, who died in a few weeks, was held to be on inadequate consideration.¹⁰ So conveyance of land worth three thousand dollars on consideration of supporting a feeble grantor of eighty;¹¹ has been held on inadequate consideration. A conveyance to a child in consideration of support for life of a grantor aged eighty-six has been upheld.¹² So inadequacy of consideration and unfairness of a contract for support have been held to exist where the promise to furnish support was unenforceable, as where it was made orally when required to be in writing;¹³ or where the promisor gave no security for performance and had no means of performing outside of the property thus conveyed.¹⁴ So a conveyance upon the grantee's verbal promise to pay a lien on the property which the grantor was under no personal obligation to pay was held to be on inadequate consideration.¹⁵ On the other hand payment of sixteen dollars an acre of land worth twenty-three dollars an acre,¹⁶ is held not to be inadequate.

Inadequacy of consideration is not, by itself, ground for granting equitable relief as by rescission or cancellation.¹ It has been said in obiter that inadequacy may be in equity a ground for setting aside an executory contract, but not for cancelling an executed conveyance.² It has even been held that inadequacy not rendering the contract unconscionable will not prevent the remedy of specific performance from being given;³ but by statute in some jurisdictions, specific performance is refused unless the consideration is adequate.⁴

§226. Inadequacy of consideration in combination with other facts.

Inadequacy of consideration is therefore merely a circumstance among others to be used in determining whether fraud or undue influence exist.¹ Among the facts which in combination with inadequacy of consideration establish fraud or undue influence are confidential relations between the parties, weakness of mind of the party receiving the inadequate consideration, misstatement, non-disclosure, mistake of fact or law, and circumstances of oppression and concealment. The effect of combinations of these facts will accordingly next be considered.

§227. Confidential relationship and inadequacy of consideration.

In transactions between persons in confidential relations, where an advantage is taken by the person holding the dominating situation, the fact of inadequacy of consideration, even in the absence of a weakness of mind, greatly strengthens the presumption of undue influence.¹ Thus a conveyance by a child to a parent,² a contract by a ward to convey to the guardian, made soon after the relationship has expired,³ a conveyance by a niece to an uncle in whom she has great confidence,⁴ especially if he has been her guardian,⁵ a conveyance by a wife to her husband,⁶ a conveyance to a spiritual adviser,⁷ a conveyance in trust to a physician and attorney on their advice,⁸ or a releasee by a devisee to an executor,⁹ have all been avoided if on inadequate consideration. So a surrender by a legatee to an executor of legal rights made under a mistake as to their nature and for an inadequate consideration, will be avoided.¹⁰

Like principles apply where trust and confidence or actual influence exist, though without technical relations.¹¹ Thus a mortgage,¹² or conveyance,¹³ by a parent to a child, or by a step-mother to her step-son,¹⁴ a note given by an uncle to his nephew who had full management of his business,¹⁵ a sale of a legacy to a legatee's confidential adviser,¹⁶ or a conveyance to a sister who has great influence over the grantor,¹⁷ have all been set aside if on inadequate consideration. However the relation between parent and child is such that a conveyance by a parent to a child on inadequate consideration, or without any consideration,¹⁸ is not on that ground alone regarded as caused by undue influence or constructive fraud.

§228. Inadequacy of consideration and circumstances of oppression.

Inadequacy of consideration may be found in connection with circumstances of oppression which do not amount to technical duress; and the combination may justify a finding of undue influence.¹ Thus a transaction entered into under great mental distress, caused by domestic calamity,² or by threats made by a husband to his wife to take away her children so that she should never see them again,³ or by fear of a contest of her husband's will by his heirs, which could not affect the property in question,⁴ will be relieved against in equity. The propriety of relief is especially clear if under great mental distress due to the death of her husband, the person seeking relief is induced by threats of violence to relinquish a legacy given her by her husband's will for an inadequate and nominal consideration.⁵ So a transaction entered into for an inadequate consideration, by taking advantage of the financial necessities of the party seeking relief, will be relieved against in equity.⁶ "When a person is encumbered with debts and that fact is known to a person with whom he contracts, who avails himself of it to exact an unconscionable bargain equity will relieve upon account of the advantage and hardship."⁷ Thus a pledgor agreed to pay par for certain bonds worth thirty cents on the dollar, in order to induce the pledgee to allow him to redeem certain stocks and bonds which were undoubtedly his, but which the pledgee refused to allow him to redeem on other terms. The pledgor was in such straightened circumstances that a delay for purposes of litigation would have caused his financial ruin. The contract was set aside in equity.⁸ So a quitclaim deed executed because the title deeds were withheld by the adversary party, who threatened to drive the grantors in the quitclaim deed from home, sue them, and ruin them financially, has been canceled in equity.⁹ A was in urgent need of money to take up an overdue mortgage debt. B agreed to lend him the necessary amount, two thousand five hundred dollars; and also to lend him seven thousand five hundred dollars more on good security; in consideration of which A agreed to repay the loans with interest and further agreed to buy for twenty dollars an acre, five hundred ninety-three acres of land worth ten dollars an acre. The court rescinded the contract of sale and decreed that the mortgage should stand as security for the money loaned with interest.¹⁰ A sale of property, a mortgage on which is about to be foreclosed, for considerably less than its value, but for all that can be obtained for it in open market, has been upheld.¹¹ Thus a contract by a legatee releasing rights given by will, entered into by reason of threats made by her brother and sister to contest the will and exhaust the estate will not be enforced, specifically where the legatee was an ignorant woman and acted without any legal advice as to her rights.¹²

Inadequacy of consideration, together with circumstances of unfair dealing not amounting to technical fraud may establish undue influence.¹ Thus a deed executed by an aged and illiterate couple who were controlled by their daughter and her husband, for a grossly inadequate consideration in favor of such daughter was set aside.²

§230. Inadequacy of consideration and weakness of mind.

Inadequacy of consideration may be found in connection with weakness of mind and the combination of facts may be such as to sustain a finding of undue influence.¹ Thus a conveyance by a woman of between sixty and seventy, in very poor health, of doubtful mental capacity, made a few weeks before her death, of property worth from six to eight thousand dollars, in consideration of a payment of two hundred fifty dollars in cash, and an annuity of five hundred dollars for life, together with doctor's bills, was set aside.² So a conveyance by an aged man of weak mind for the purpose of securing a loan will be held to be a mortgage.³

If, in addition to confidential relations and weakness of mind on the part of the party reposing trust and confidence, of whom it is alleged that advantage has been taken, it is further shown that the transaction was based on an inadequate consideration, the presumption of undue influence is greatly strengthened.¹ If in addition the party holding the dominating position does not disclose to the other facts which it is his duty to disclose, the presumption of undue influence is still further strengthened,² as an assignment by a beneficiary under a will to an executor who does not disclose facts known to him by virtue of his office.³ Circumstances of oppression and concealment still further strengthen this presumption, as where the conveyance is kept secret from the grantor's other children.⁴

§232. Confidential relationship, weakness of mind, inadequacy of consideration and circumstances of oppression.

In a transaction between persons in a confidential relation, where the party seeking relief is physically and mentally weak, and the consideration is inadequate, the addition of circumstances of oppression, such as keeping the party who is alleged to be subject to undue influence in close custody, and preventing the access of other persons in interest, or independent advisers,¹ or keeping him in custody though it does not appear that other persons were actively excluded, if in fact it appears that no independent advice was given,² or a threat by a husband to abandon his wife,³ or using a divorce suit already brought by a husband against his wife as a means of intimidation,⁴ still further tends to establish undue influence. The fact that under such circumstances the beneficiary prepared the conveyance, tends further to establish undue influence.⁵ Similar results follow where advantage is taken of oppression by a third person, even if in no way connected with the beneficiary of the transaction or acting in concert with him.⁶ Thus a conveyance made by an aged and feeble woman while greatly excited by the threat of another to sue her for slander, made to the infant son of her confidential agent, by a conveyance which she understands to be a sham will, to defeat the claims of the plaintiff in the prospective slander suit, has been held to be caused by undue influence.⁷

inadequate consideration, and misleading statements by the adversary party, or omission to make full disclosure when he should do so, may establish the fact of undue influence and avoid the transaction.¹ If the weakness of mind is due to the contrivance of the adversary party, as by causing the party taken advantage of to become intoxicated, the propriety of relief is even clearer, though the doctrine of fraud rather than undue influence is likely to be invoked.² Representations which do not amount to technical fraud may in connection with the facts discussed in this section, constitute a ground for relief; though fraud, rather than undue influence will usually be assigned as a reason for granting relief. Thus under such circumstances, false statements as to value,³ or a pretended partnership arrangement entered into to defraud the grantor, who is thus induced to convey his interest in valuable mining property while intoxicated, for an inadequate consideration,⁴ may be regarded as fraud. So a sale of property worth a thousand dollars for five dollars, made by an aged and ignorant negro who did not know what his rights were, to a vendee whose agent told him that the property was "worth some money if the right parties could be found" was set aside.⁵

The discussion of the facts which in combination with inadequacy of consideration, avoid a contract has carried us well into the subject of the unconscionable contract. An unconscionable contract is said to be one "such as no man in his senses and not under a delusion would make on the one hand, and as no honest and fair man would accept on the other.”¹ To what extent inadequacy of consideration must go to make a contract unconscionable is difficult to state except in abstract terms, which give but little practical help. It has been said that there must be “An inequality so strong, gross, and manifest, that it must be impossible to state it to a man of common sense without producing an exclamation at the inequality of it.”² Another form of stating the rule is that “Where the inadequacy of price is so great that the mind revolts at it, the court will lay hold on the slightest circumstances of oppression or advantage to rescind the contract.”³ The fact that the contract is a foolish one for one of the parties, and a very advantageous one for the other, does not of itself establish the fact that it was unconscionable.⁴ Whether a consideration is so inadequate, as to render the contract unconscionable, is to be determined by the facts as they existed at the time that the contract was entered into, and not by subsequent developments over which neither party had control.⁵ Hence a conveyance of property which is the subject of pending and uncertain litigation,⁶ or the title to which is imperfect and which is heavily encumbered,⁷ cannot be said to be for so inadequate a consideration as to justify rescission, even though for a price far less than the property ultimately proves to be worth. A common type of unconscionable contracts exists where a borrower, in order to obtain the loan, enters into a collateral agreement to buy property at an exorbitant price.⁸ A borrowing member of a building and loan association secured a loan of one thousand five hundred dollars, which was to be repaid by his purchasing and paying for thirty shares of stock at one hundred dollars a share, and surrendering it to the company in payment of the loan, and also paying six per cent. interest on the loan. The payments for the stock were to extend over a period of nearly seven years. The result of the transaction was that the debtor was paying interest at the rate of twenty-six per cent. per annum. This was held to be "simply a cunning device to obscure the real transaction, and to induce the respondent to believe that by subscribing for the stock he would derive a benefit other than the advancement of the sum loaned." The contract was set aside as unconscionable, on payment by the debtor of the amount borrowed with six per cent. interest.⁹ A similar, though less disguised form of unconscionable contract, exists where the borrowers agree to pay money greatly in excess of amounts borrowed by them.¹⁰ Where usury laws are in force, the rate of interest that can be exacted can be determined by such laws. If no usury laws exist, the doctrine of the unconscionable contract is often invoked to protect the borrower from agreements entered into by him under financial necessity. A loan to one in financial necessity, with interest at the rate of five per cent. a month, payable monthly in advance, was held to be an unconscionable contract. The debtor was relieved on his paying the amount borrowed with reasonable interest.¹¹ A contract to pay interest at the rate of four per cent. a month has been held to be unconscionable.¹² A contract to pay interest at the rate of ten per cent. on a loan of twenty-five dollars for one month,¹³ has been held not to be so unconscionable as to be unenforceable. Where usury laws are in force, some courts seem to hold that the doctrine of the unconscionable contract as such is practically abrogated, and that the only question for discussion is whether the contract is illegal.¹⁴ So an agreement by illiterate persons who are heirs to an estate, to give to one who informs them of the existence of the property and their title to it, facts which they did not know, one half the net amount thereof, will be set aside as an improvident bargain obtained by taking an unfair advantage, where the property is in the hands of a public trustee, their title is clear, and no litigation is contemplated.¹⁵ An agreement between members of a communistic society, that if any member withdraws, or dies, neither he nor his representatives shall be entitled to an account of his property, is not unconscionable.¹⁶ An agreement for gratuitous services, such as the gratuitous storage of goods,¹⁷ though unenforceable as far as executory, is not so unconscionable that the party rendering such services can recover compensation in spite of the agreement. Land was laid out in city lots, and certain lots were sold out of said tract with the expectation of establishing a city thereon. Subsequently, after the project had failed, the vendor agreed to take a reconveyance of part of such property in payment of an unpaid part of the purchase price. The land at that time was useful only for farming and grazing purposes; and the fact that the lots already sold, amounting to nearly a third of the entire tract, were located at various places on such tract, made the portion reconveyed of but slight value for grazing purposes. However the price already paid by the vendee exceeded the reasonable value of the entire tract. It was held that the vendor could not avoid the contract for reconveyance as unconscionable.¹⁸ A compromise agreement, by which thirty-three thousand dollars was to be advanced for an issue of forty thousand dollars, par value, of first mortgage bonds of a corporation, is not unconscionable.¹⁹ A provision in a contract of loan, that the debtor is not to be permitted to discharge his debt by borrowing money unless it is borrowed from the creditor, is unconscionable.²⁰ Such contracts are said to be void as against public policy. So a provision for payment of attorney's fee by the debtor in case of suit is held to be void,²¹ whether in a note,²² or mortgage,²³ or trust deed.²⁴ If invalid in a note it is said that "for a stronger reason the stipulation would be invalid in a mortgage or deed of trust where the opportunity for oppression is greater."²⁵ In other jurisdictions, however, such a contract is held to be valid. The latter view, as will appear from the cases cited, has the support of the majority of the courts.²⁶ Since such a contract is said in some states to be void, the courts using the term correctly must regard the subject-matter as defective; and this we find to be the case in other at such a price that the investment will yield an annual income of from twelve to twenty-two per cent., cannot be set aside at the instance of the vendee as unconscionable.³⁶ Contracts of the classes discussed in this section and those following are on the border line between those open to attack for want of a valid offer and acceptance, and those open to attack for want of a valid subject-matter.

The unconscionable contract has already been discussed from the standpoint of constructive fraud and undue influence, in equity.¹ It may be noted here that the same doctrine has been applied by some courts of law;² namely that one class of fraud is "apparent from the intrinsic nature and subject of the bargain itself; such as no man in his senses would make on the one hand, and as no honest and fair man would accept on the other; which are unequitable and unconscientious bargains; and of such even the common law has taken notice;"³ and that "if a contract be unreasonable and unconscionable but not void for fraud, a court of law will give to the party who sues for its breach damages, not according to its letter, but only such as he is equitably entitled to."⁴ Some of the earlier cases have become classic. Thus in James v. Morgan,⁵ the contract was to pay for a horse at the rate of "a Barley-corn a nail, doubling it every nail," which came to five hundred quarters of barley. The judge, Sir Robert Hyde, directed the jury to give the value of the horse as damages. In Thornborough v. Whiteacre,⁶ the contract sued on was that in consideration of two shillings and sixpence paid down, and four pounds, seventeen shillings and sixpence to be paid when the contract was performed, the defendant promised to give to the plaintiff two grains of rye corn on a certain Monday and double it successively on each Monday for a year. The total amount to be delivered was five hundred twenty-four million, two hundred eighty-eight thousand quarters of rye. Instead of pleading fraud the defendant demurred to the declaration. The court said that though the contract was a foolish one the defendant ought to pay something for his folly; and so defendant's counsel "perceiving the opinion of the court to be against his client, offered the plaintiff his half crown and his cost, which was accepted of, and so no judgment was given in the case." To turn to more modern examples, in Hume v. United States,⁷ the government prepared specifications for bids in which shucks were to be bid at so much per pound instead of per hundredweight, as was customary and intended. A inserted sixty cents opposite this item, and thus bid sixty cents a pound for shucks that were then worth thirty-five dollars a ton. The contract was awarded to him; but the officers refused to pay the contract price. He sued in the Court of Claims, and was allowed only the market price;⁸ and this judgment was affirmed by the Supreme Court, with the remark that "there may be contracts so extortionate and unconscionable on their face as to raise the presumption of fraud in their inception, or at least to require but slight additional evidence to justify such presumption. In such cases the natural and irresistible inference of fraud is as efficacious to maintain the defense at law as to sustain an application for affirmative relief in equity."⁹ The ground on which most of the cases here cited are based is fraud or mistake. Similar results have been reached on the theory of public policy. Contracts made by municipal corporations have been explained on this theory. Thus a contract to give an attorney one third of the revenue of a ferry for twenty years, amounting to about three thousand dollars a year, for perfecting the city's title to lots worth about one hundred fifty dollars, was held void as being unreasonable and contrary to public policy.¹⁰ So a contract employing attorneys to acquire a town-site patent, under an agreement to pay them ten dollars for each lot or parcel sold and conveyed under the patent has been held invalid, as indefinite in that there was no limitation as to the size or number of the lots, and because the lots might be made so small and so numerous that the contract might be unreasonable and unconscionable."¹¹ Other cases are decided upon grounds akin to duress and undue influence. If a promise is supported by a consideration so inadequate that "the mind revolts at the enforcement of such a promise," the courts will "seize upon the slightest act of oppression or advantage to set at naught a promise thus obtained."¹² A married woman A and her husband B had assigned an insurance policy on B's life to X for value. At maturity the insurers refused to pay the policy unless A's name were indorsed thereon; and A refused so to indorse it until X agreed in writing to pay A five hundred dollars. A subsequently brought suit on this contract. It was held that she could not recover.¹³

IV. CONTRACTS WITH EXPECTANT HEIRS, REMAINDER-MEN AND REVERSIONERS.

§236. Nature, scope and effect of such contracts.

Expectant heirs, remainder-men and reversioners were looked upon by the English Courts of Equity as being in a state of chronic distress.¹ The actual existence of financial embarrassment was not necessary to induce the courts to apply to contracts of persons of this class concerning their interests in expectancy the same rules that apply to persons in circumstances of distress.² A contract of this sort is known as a 'catching bargain.'³ In speaking of expectant heirs, it has been said: "To that class of persons this court (i. e. chancery) seems to have extended a degree of protection approaching nearly to an incapacity to bind themselves by contract."⁴ Upon the effect of such contracts made upon inadequate consideration there is a conflict of authority. The English rule,⁵ which is followed in some American states,⁶ is that inadequacy of consideration in such contracts amounts per se to undue influence or constructive fraud. The rule adopted by other American states is that inadequacy of consideration is a circumstance tending to show undue influence or constructive fraud, but not of itself conclusive.⁷ These principles apply to all sales of expectant interests,⁸ including alike the interests of expectant heirs,⁹ of expectant devisees and legatees,¹⁰ and of remainder-men and reversioners,¹¹ but not of legatees whose legacy is deferred.¹² The principles apply to contracts for the sale,¹³ or mortgage,¹⁴ of the expectant interest: and to contracts for the payment of money on the death of the person on whose death the expectancy will vest in possession, or it is hoped will so vest.¹⁵

§237. What constitutes inadequacy of consideration in contracts with expectant heirs.

Inadequacy of consideration has a peculiar and special meaning in this connection. Though at one time it was held that the value of the reversionary interest was to be determined for the purposes of applying these principles as in other cases, by determining the value of the life estate from tables of mortality and deducting this value from the full value of an estate in fee in possession in the property in question,¹ this rule seems to have been generally abandoned on the ground that it is "gambling upon the lives of the ancestors and life tenants and so against public policy."² The rule now in force is that the incumbrance of the life estate is not to be considered in determining the adequacy of the consideration for the remainderman's conveyance of the fee.³ In some of the cases in which this rule is laid down, other circumstances than mere inadequacy are found. Thus a conveyance of a remainder in property the value of the entire fee of which was three thousand dollars, was made by one who had just come of age, to relatives with whom he had lived, who had great influence over him, and who prevented him from learning the value of his interest, in pursuance of a contract made by him during minority, in consideration of five hundred sixty-two dollars. The conveyance was set aside.⁴ One of the leading cases on the subject of inadequacy of consideration in loans to expectant heirs,⁵ has had the fortune to furnish an opinion which has formed the text of most of what has since been written on the subject, while the actual ground of decision has been often either ignored or misunderstood. In that case, A an expectant heir, aged thirty-five and not in very good health, borrowed five thousand pounds of B; and gave therefor his single bond to pay ten thousand pounds on the death of his ancestress, the Duchess of Marlborough, if he survived her. He then gave a penal bond in the sum of twenty thousand pounds conditioned on the payment of the first bond. After his death which followed that of his ancestress, his executors resisted payment of the bonds. Equity gave relief against the penal bond but enforced the single bond. So where three hundred and fifty pounds was borrowed and a bond for seven hundred pounds payable when a reversion should vest in possession was given the transaction was upheld.⁶ A bargain much like that in Chesterfield v. Janssen, except that judgments were entered into instead of bonds was avoided on payment of the amount borrowed with interest.⁷

One complicating principle remains for notice. While the interests of remainder-men and reversioners cannot be affected by the life-tenant, and are therefore not within the principle to be referred to, the interests of expectant heirs and devisees are dependent on the will and caprice of the ancestor or testator. A contract therefore, whereby such expectant heir or devisee transfers to another, in whole or in part, the bounty which his benefactor intends for him, operates as a fraud upon such ancestor or testator if the existence of the contract is not disclosed to him. The opinions of some courts express the view that this reason is the true basis of the doctrine of the "catching bargain," or at least an essential element thereof. Where this view is entertained it is held on the one hand that if the ancestor does not know of such contract and assent thereto, the contract is voidable.¹ The effect, on the other hand, of the knowledge and assent of the ancestor, is a question upon which there is a conflict of authority. Most American states seem to hold that if "the transaction has been fully made known, at the time, to the parent or other person standing in loco parentis and is not objected to by him, the extraordinary protection generally afforded in cases of this sort by courts of equity will be withdrawn. A fortiori will it be withdrawn if the transaction is expressly sanctioned and adopted by such parent or person in loco parentis.² The English courts seem to discard the first of the alternatives, and hold that the special protection of equity will be withdrawn only if the ancestor adopts the transaction³ The doctrine of the effect of ancestral interference seems to be well settled; yet, were the question open, both the grounds for applying such principle at all and the logic of the manner of applying it as it is done would be open to very serious objections. (1) The real reason for the doctrine of the catching bargain is the protection of the improvident heir. The doctrine of ancestral sanction is irreconcilable with this principle except on the theory of independent advice. If this is the real ground, it would follow that if such advice is given and in accordance therewith, the adequacy of the consideration received therefor is immaterial: and it has been so held.⁴ The interest of the heir, then seems to be completely ignored. In *Jenkins v. Pye*⁵ the Supreme Court of the United States carried this principle to a logical conclusion by holding that a conveyance by a young woman of an interest in remainder upon the advice of her father, the life-tenant, was valid though upon an inadequate consideration, and though he advised its conveyance to himself. Other jurisdictions have, however, declined to follow this case.⁶ (2) A ground for the doctrine of ancestral approval is alleged to be that the "catching bargain" is a fraud upon him and is contrary to public policy. This ground is clearly untenable, since it is assumed that such contracts may be ratified by the expectant heir after the special circumstances have ceased to operate.⁷ This is plainly inconsistent with the theory of the contract's being illegal or void on the ground of public policy.

V. EFFECT OF UNDUE INFLUENCE.

The person subjected to undue influence, or his legal representative, may avoid the transaction and recover what he has parted with.¹ Thus a guardian² may avoid for his ward. If the property transferred is personal property, he may sue to recover the same at law.³ If a conveyance of real property has been made, a suit in equity for a rescission will lie⁴ and is necessary.⁵ Ordinarily a conveyance or contract executed under undue influence must be avoided in toto if at all. If, however, the grantor wishes a life estate reserved to him and the remainder to pass to the grantee the grantee will be required to execute a declaration of trust.⁶

§240. Terms on which transaction may be avoided.

A contract or conveyance induced by undue influence is voidable, and not void.¹ Accordingly, if the party of whom advantage is taken wishes to avoid the transaction, he must return what he has received thereunder.² Thus if the grantor has reserved a life estate and the grantee has furnished money to the grantor to make improvements thereon, the grantor must refund such amount.³ The party seeking relief may tender the value of the property received by him if he has parted with it under the continuance of such undue influence.⁴ If the thing which he has received under such transaction is not of any value, he is not obliged to return it. Thus in a suit of an administrator to set aside a transfer of personal property, on the ground of undue influence, the administrator need not tender back the contract entered into by the adversary party, to support such person, which has been discharged by the death of the person making such transfer.⁵

The person subjected to undue influence may, if he chooses, after such influence is removed, ratify the transaction and make it as valid as it would have been if there had been no undue influence.¹ Conduct while the influence exists does not constitute ratification.² It has been held that payment of interest on negotiable notes before maturity is not ratification; since if payment is refused, there is danger that the notes may be transferred to bona fide holders.³

No relief can be given to a person who voluntarily enters into an illegal transaction. If, however, a person is by undue influence induced to enter into an illegal transaction, he may when such influence is removed, avoid the transaction and recover what he has parted with.¹ Thus payment to the judge of a Probate Court for services in settling the contest of a will, made at the judge's suggestion and in ignorance of the illegality of his practising law while judge may be recovered.² Conveyances to defraud creditors, made under the undue influence of the grantee may be avoided.³ A conveyance by a grantor to the wife of his attorney to defraud his creditors will not be set aside where it appears that the grantor was a shrewd and unscrupulous business man and not under his attorney's control.⁴

Ordinarily the only remedy in a case of contract or conveyance made by undue influence is a rescission, either informally at law, or formally in equity. An action for damages will not lie.¹ If, however, the person who has received property by means of undue influence exerted by him upon the adversary party has transferred it to a purchaser in good faith without notice, the person subjected to such undue influence may recover the value thereof from the original wrong-doer.² If the party guilty of undue influence retains the property received by such means he must account for the reasonable value thereof. Thus in case of a sale of a legacy induced by undue influence, it has been held that the vendor may recover the difference between the actual value of the legacy and what he received for it under such contract.³

DURESS.

I. NATURE OF DURESS.

§244. Nature and classes of duress.

Duress according to the earlier view, consists of such violence, threats or other wrongful conduct as can, in contemplation of the law, overpower the mind of the party against whom they are directed, and does in fact, so overpower it as to compel him to assent apparently to a contract to which in the absence of such duress he would not have assented.¹ The modern definition of duress is rather that of a state of mind, induced by fear, in which it is impossible for the party subjected thereto to exercise his own free will.² While the nature and effect of duress have been before the courts for a long time, the law is to-day in a transition stage.³ This is due to two causes. First, the old ¹United States v. Huckabee, 16 Wall (U. S.) 414; McClair v. Wilson, 18 Colo. 82; 31 Pac. 502; Cribbs v. Sowle, 87 Mich. 340; 24 Am. St. Rep. 166; 49 N. W. 587; Hackley v. Headley, 45 Mich. 569; 8 N. W. 511; Feller v. Green, 26 Mich. 70; Nebraska Mutual Bond Association v. Klee, — Neb. —; 97 N. W. 476; Earle v. Hosiery Co., 36 N. J. Eq. 188; Parmenter v. Pater, 13 Or. 121; Galusha v. Sherman, 105 Wis. 263; 47 L. R. A. 417; 81 N. W. 495.

²Duress is "the deprivation by one person of the will power of another by putting that other in fear for the purpose of obtaining, by that means, some valuable advantage of him." Galusha v. Sherman, 105 Wis. 263; 47 L. R. A. 417; 81 N. W. 495. "Duress of a person is that condition of his mind caused by the wrongful conduct of another, rendering him incompetent to contract by the exercise of his own free will." Batavian Bank v. North, 114 Wis. 637; 90 N. W. 1016; citing, Galusha v. Sherman, 105 Wis. 263; 47 L. R. A. 417; 81 N. W. 495. "Duress exists when one, by the unlawful act of another, is induced to make a contract or perform some other act under circumstances which deprives him of the exercise of free will." Hackley v. Headley, 45 Mich. 569; 8 N. W. 511; quoted in First National Bank v. Sargent, — Neb. —; 91 N. W. 595.

point of view looked to the nature of the threats or violence as the primary test of duress; the modern point of view looks to the effect of whatever threats or violence are used, on the mind of the person subjected thereto.⁴ Second: the union of legal and equitable actions in many jurisdictions has tended to swallow up the definite but limited Common-Law notion of duress in the broader but vaguer doctrine of undue influence which finds its operation chiefly in equity.⁵

Duress as to the method whereby it is caused may be divided into two classes (1) duress of the person, as by (a) violence or (b) imprisonment; and (2) duress of property. Each of these again may be (1) actual or (2) threatened. Further the person subject to duress may be either (1) the very person against whom violence threats and the like are directed or (2) one standing in certain relations to such person. Each of these classes must be considered separately.

The original Common-Law rule was that there could be no duress unless the threats or violence were of such sort as to overcome the mind of a courageous man.¹ The first step in

⁴ "The ancient law of duress applied only to duress of the person, such as amounted to a reasonable apprehension of imminent danger to life, limb or liberty, which was in law deemed sufficient to avoid a contract or enable the injured party to recover back money when so paid. The law, however, has progressed and gradually extended the doctrine so as to recognize duress of property as a species of moral duress which might equally with duress of the person constitute a defense to a contract induced thereby, or entitle a party to recover money paid under its influence." First National Bank v. Sargent, — Neb.—; 91 N. W. 595.

ty we are of the opinion that the Civil Code which authorizes equitable defenses in common-law actions necessarily carries with it the rules of equity applicable to the disposition of such issues." Buford v. R. R., 82 Ky. 286.

¹ "Qui cadere possit in virum constantem." Bracton 1. 2 c. 5; quoted 1 Black. Com. 131. "Not a vain fear but such as may befall a constant man." Co. Litt. 253b. But Coke is speaking here of such duress as will excuse actual entry on land and will allow a claim made by him "as near to the tenements as he dare," to be equivalent to an entry for purposes of seisin. See the discussion in Galusha v. Sherman, 105 Wis. 263; 47 L. R. A. 417; 81

putting this rule on a more rational basis was to hold that duress might consist of any conduct which could overpower the mind of an ordinarily firm man. This rule is repeated by many courts, in obiter at least; for few decisions seem really to rest on this principle.² Thus where duress is caused by threats, it has been said that there must be a reasonable ground for belief that the party making the threat has the power to carry it into execution.³ Where the question has come squarely at issue the great majority of the courts have taken the second step necessary to put the doctrine of duress on a rational basis, and have held that duress exists where the threats or violence used were such as to overpower the mind of the person subjected thereto.⁴

The difference between the old rule and the new amounts in fact to less than appears at first because in the absence of affirmative evidence the person subjected to duress must be assumed to be ordinarily firm and prudent. In discussing duress, accordingly, we must consider (1) what acts or words may in contemplation of law amount to duress: (2) whether such conduct did in the particular case cause duress: and (3) the effect of duress if it exists.

II. WHAT MAY AMOUNT TO DURESS.

§246. Forms of duress.—Violence.

Actual violence may undoubtedly constitute duress.¹ Thus where a husband compelled his wife to sign articles of separation by knocking her down and kicking her, such articles were decreed void.² So where one is compelled to execute an instrument or make a contract by mob violence,³ or by violence of "The law no longer allows a person to enjoy, without disturbance, the fruits of his iniquity, because his victim was not a person of ordinary courage; and no longer gauges the acts that shall be held legally sufficient to produce duress by any arbitrary standard, but holds him who, by putting another in fear, shall have produced in him a state of mental incompetency to contract, and then takes advantage of such condition, no matter by what means such fear be caused, liable at the option of such other to make restitution to him of everything of value thereby taken from him." Galusha v. Sherman, 105 Wis. 263; 47 L. R. A. 417; 81 N. W. 495. "Nor in my opinion is it the true policy of the law to make an arbitrary and unyielding rule in such cases to apply to all alike without regard to age, sex, or condition of mind. Weak and cowardly people, and old and ignorant persons, are the ones that need the protection of the courts, and they are the ones usually operated upon and influenced by threats." *Cribbs v. robbers⁴ or by reason of an assault with a deadly weapon⁵ duress exists. In some of these cases, however, the actual violence is ignored in the pleadings of the parties and the opinion of the court and the ground for the decisions is said to be duress per minas.⁶

Unlawful imprisonment may undoubtedly amount to duress¹ as where a father is arrested on an illegal warrant charging him with kidnaping his own minor child, and is thereby coerced into signing a release of his authority over the child.² If the imprisonment is lawful and is used as a means of extortion, duress exists,³ as where the arrest was made without any intention of prosecuting, but solely to obtain the instrument signed.⁴ If the imprisonment is lawful and made in good faith, without the intention of extorting the instrument in question, some courts hold that duress does not exist.⁵ Thus a note given by the father of a bastard to the mother while the father is under arrest is not given under duress.⁶ But the better view seems to be that duress exists if the prisoner is actually coerced into signing an instrument that he otherwise would not have signed but for such imprisonment, whether it is lawful or un-

§248. Duress of property.

The original English rule was that neither seizure nor destruction of property, actual or threatened, could be treated as duress for the purpose of avoiding a contract thereby induced.¹ Thus duress could not be interposed as a defense to a note for an amount of rent greatly in excess of that due, given to obtain the release of an excessive distress.² By some process of reasoning the English courts reached the conclusion that a payment of money induced by duress of property could be recovered but an executory contract induced thereby could not be avoided.³ The American courts in early cases first followed the English courts⁴ then began to distinguish the more extreme cases,⁵ and finally repudiated the English rule as an entirety. "The two rules recognized by the courts of England, it seems to us, lead to an obvious absurdity; that is to say, that when one pays money in order to obtain possession of his goods when unlawfully detained by another he may recover it back, but if he gives his note under the same circumstances and for the same purpose, he cannot successfully resist its payment."⁶ "If therefore such be the case where money has been paid, a fortiori is such a defense available in an action upon a promissory note extorted in the manner alleged."⁷ The English rule was based upon two reasons: (1) that duress of property could not affect the firm and courageous man whom the law assumed as the test for the influence of duress;⁸ (2) that the party threatened with loss of property had an adequate remedy in tróver, replevin and the like.⁹ It will be seen that battery and duress of property are treated by Blackstone as equally inoperative. The first reason is now very generally discarded in the United States.¹⁰ The second reason is still recognized in some jurisdictions where no circumstances of especial hardship exist. Some courts hold that if under the facts replevin is an adequate remedy, duress of property cannot exist;¹¹ others that such duress may exist even if the property could be recovered by replevin.¹² Under the first of these views, a seizure of A's property by an officer having a writ of execution against B, is not such duress as will avoid a receipt and contract to return such property given by A to such officer.¹³ The influence of the English rule is thus marked even in some jurisdictions which have discarded it as an entirety. An accurate statement of the modern American rule is therefore difficult on account of a lack of harmony in the decisions of the courts. Further while many courts

⁹ "A fear of battery, or being beaten, though never so well grounded, is no duress; neither is the fear of having one's house burned or one's goods taken away and destroyed; because in these cases, should the threat be performed, a man may have satisfaction by recovering equivalent damages." 1 Black. term detention of goods duress, others refer to it as merely analogous to duress.¹⁴

The following classes of cases should be distinguished: (1) If circumstances of especial hardship exist, American courts are practically unanimous in holding that a promise made to obtain property unlawfully detained may be avoided for duress.¹⁵ Thus a promise made to obtain a release of perishable property, such as oysters, from an unlawful attachment was held to be induced by duress.¹⁶ So where an officer A had taken B's banknotes on attachment and after such attachment was released A refused to redeliver such notes to B unless B would agree to pay A and would pay A some of this money as a reward for A's alleged finding of such notes after they had been lost, and B did so because as A knew, X another officer was about to attach such notes, B's promise and payment were held to have been made under duress.¹⁷ So where A an officer had levied a sequestration on B's property which he refused to release unless B would give a bond conditioned to do acts other and further than required by law, duress was held to invalidate the bond as a Common-Law bond.¹⁸ So where B was indebted to A, and B owned a horse by whose labor B made his living and supported his family which horse was exempt from execution, and A obtained possession of such horse by fraudulently representing that it was to be sold for cash, and then refused to redeliver it until B gave a note secured by mortgage on such horse for a sum in excess of B's debt to A, it was held that B could avoid such mortgage.¹⁹ (2) Even if no circumstances of especial hardship exist, the decided preponderance of authority seems to be in favor of the rule that wrongful seizure or detention of property may be such duress as to invalidate contracts induced thereby,²⁰ and may be a ground for avoiding such liability.²¹ Thus X, A's clerk pledged notes owned by A, to B, to secure X's gambling debt. B refused to surrender them till A gave his note for X's debt. To secure the release of such notes A did so. Such note was held voidable as given under duress.²² (3) If the party who is alleged to have exercised duress has done only what he had a legal right to do, duress cannot exist.²³ (4) The foregoing cases concern personalty. The doctrine of duress of property may apply to realty as well as to personalty, though ordinarily circumstances of especial hardship must exist to constitute duress.²⁴

The original Common-Law rule seems to have been that duress per minas could exist only when the threat was of loss of life, limb or liberty.¹ This was part of the old theory that duress was to be tested by the nature of the act or threat, without reference to the effect thereof on the mind of the person subjected thereto,² and that to be duress the act in question must be such as could affect a brave, or at least a reasonably firm man.³ The modern tendency being to discard such tests, the ment threatened, appears to be imminent,² as where it is believed that a warrant has issued³ or where the husband of the person subjected to duress is in custody though not under arrest.⁴ Some courts limit duress by threat of criminal prosecution to cases where the imprisonment threatened is immediate, and not merely the result of a successful prosecution.⁵ So a threat to institute criminal prosecution against one who is in another state,⁶ or country⁷ has been held not to be duress. It has even been said that a threat of criminal prosecution is not duress as long as no warrant has issued.⁸ This rule is based on the old theory that only such acts as can be supposed to overcome the mind of an ordinary person can amount to duress. But inasmuch as the institution of criminal proceedings usually involves the arrest of the alleged criminal the weight of modern authority seems to be that such imprisonment is sufficiently immediate to constitute duress;⁹ although it is natural that, other things being equal, a possible but distant imprisonment should have less effect on the mind than immediate imprisonment.

A threat of imprisonment may operate as duress though it is not for a technical crime. Thus a statement by the court that a boy will be sent to the reformatory unless a bond is given for his support at an industrial home¹⁰ or a threat of arrest for non-payment of a license fee¹¹ may cause duress. Some states confuse nomenclature by calling a threatened arrest a "menace" but not duress.¹²

On the question of whether to constitute duress the threatened imprisonment must be unlawful, the courts differ. If the threatened imprisonment is unlawful, duress exists.¹ If the threat is of lawful imprisonment but it is unlawfully used to obtain the contract, duress exists.² Abuse of criminal process, whereby one is coerced into giving a note³ is clearly duress. If the threat is of lawful imprisonment and it is not intended to make unlawful use thereof in coercing the prisoner, the courts are divided as to whether duress exists. The majority hold that if the threat of imprisonment overpowers the mind of the prisoner, duress exists.⁴ A minority hold that a threat of lawful imprisonment made in good faith without the intent of extorting the contract in question thereby, is not duress.⁵ The effect of the guilt or innocence of the person whose arrest and criminal prosecution is threatened is another question on which the courts do not agree. If the charge is a false and trumped up one, duress exists,⁶ though some courts which adhere to the old test that the threats must be such as to overpower a reasonably firm man seem to hold that under ordinary circumstances a false criminal charge against an innocent man cannot be duress.⁷ If the warrant for arrest is issued not bona fide but for purposes of intimidation, duress exists and the question of the guilt or innocence of the accused is immaterial.⁸ If it is a bona fide charge some courts hold that duress does not exist even though the accused may prove to be innocent;⁹ others hold that duress may exist, if the mind of the promisor is in fact overpowered.¹⁰ Again, if the party accused is guilty, some courts hold that a threat of criminal prosecution cannot be duress;¹¹ while other courts hold that it can be duress.¹² The cases which take this last mentioned view, however, are mainly cases in which a threat to arrest and prosecuting one person forms the means of intimidating another.¹³ In Illinois the view has been expressed that if the accused is innocent, and knows that there is no legal ground for his arrest, and no warrant has issued and no proceedings commenced, a threat of arrest is not duress.¹⁴

A threat of enforcing a bona fide claim by a civil action is not duress, so as to avoid a contract for the payment or compromise of such claim,¹ even though made in a period of business depression.² Thus a threat to foreclose a mortgage³ as a chattel mortgage,⁴ or to institute proceedings in attachment⁵ as threatening civil suit in admiralty, with attachment of a ship,⁶ or to re-take a piano sold on the installment plan,⁷ even if the parties who are threatened believe that criminal proceedings also will be instituted;⁸ or to issue a capias in a civil proceeding,⁹ or to have a receiver appointed,¹⁰ or to sue a stockholder of a bank on behalf of its creditors to enforce a stock liability,¹¹ or to drive a debtor into bankruptcy,¹² are none of them duress. Some courts have carried the doctrine of duress by threats farther than is indicated here. Some courts which take advanced position as to what constitutes duress have held that a threat to institute a civil action may constitute duress. Thus threatening suit against a person of rather inferior intelligence, in such sum as would exhaust his property may act as duress in coercing him into giving a note and mortgage for such claim.¹³ Under circumstances of especial hardship, a threat of civil litigation may amount to duress. Thus threatening an insured with litigation while he is ill and thereby forcing him to surrender his policy may amount to duress.¹⁴ Thus duress existed where A had given to a bank a mortgage in the form of a deed, and the bank threatened a sale of such realty unless A paid a larger sum of money than that due, and A being necessitous made a payment to the bank and entered into a new contract with bank on its terms,¹⁵ or where A is necessitous and wishes to obtain a loan on certain property as collateral security, on which property B wrongfully claims a mechanic's lien, thus, taking advantage of A's necessities to force A to pay an unjust claim.¹⁶

So a threat to attach the store of one not liable on a debt has been held to amount to duress if a payment of such debt was caused by such threats.¹⁷

Breach of contract is usually not duress.¹ Thus refusal to perform a contract for delivering ice unless a higher rate were paid, where the party who promised such higher rate did so because he would be subjected to great loss unless he got the ice,² or to perform a contract for work and labor,³ or to sell out an interest in a partnership contrary to the partnership agreement,⁴ or mere refusal to pay a debt when due,⁵ is not ordinarily duress, as where A refuses to pay B for work unless B will gratuitously repair injuries to such work done by C, and B does such work agreeing not to charge therefor,⁶ or where a creditor takes eight thousand five hundred dollars for a claim of ten thousand dollars and assigns the latter to his debtor's executor, fearing that such executor would defeat payment of such claim or would put the creditor to expense to collect it,⁷ or where the debtor has transferred his property and has become insolvent,⁸ or where government officers withhold money due for the use of a barge to compel the owner to charter it at a lower rate.⁹

§255. Advantage taken of financial necessities.

Taking advantage of a creditor's financial necessities if not caused by the debtor otherwise than by withholding payment of the debt in question and thereby compelling him to make some concession to the debtor in consideration of payment by the latter is not duress.¹ Still less is a refusal to act as one's surety for his future liability to his workmen duress, though he is thereby forced to give up a contract for grading a section of a railroad.²

Under circumstances of especial hardship and oppression an actual or threatened breach of contract may amount to duress.³ Thus a threat of cutting off the supply of water⁴ or gas,⁵ may amount to duress where such conduct will cause great damage. Where A by his wrongful conduct reduces B to financial straits and then takes advantage of his position to extort a contract that B would not otherwise have made, duress exists.⁶ So duress exists where A, a debtor of B's, induces other debtors of B's to stop payments to B, and takes advantage of the financial necessity thus produced to compel B to sign the contract demanded by A.⁷ Where A a depositor in B's bank deeded land

⁶ Adams v. Schiffer, 11 Colo. 15; 7 Am. St. Rep. 202; 17 Pac. 21; Brueggestradt v. Ludwig, 184 Ill. 24; 56 N. E. 419; affirming, 82 Ill. App. 435; Vyne v. Glenn, 41 Mich. 112; 1 N. W. 997; Fitzgerald v. Construction Co., 44 Neb. 463; 62 N. W. 899.

to B and was paid therefor, and B afterwards bought up C's unfounded claim to such land and refused to honor B's checks unless A paid B a part of what B had paid C, duress was held to exist, since B's wrongful act is the direct cause of A's necessities.⁸ So it is duress where a railroad company forces a construction company into practical insolvency by withholding payments due and thus compels it to accept a thousand dollars per mile less than the contract price.⁹ So it is duress where an insured after a fire pays to his lessor an amount which he does not owe to induce him to join in executing proofs of loss and in indorsing drafts, the insurance being payable to lessor and lessee as their interest should appear.¹⁰ So where A was badly injured in an accident caused by the negligence of a railroad company, and had no money and the company refused him transportation or compensation for his injuries unless he would accept it as performance of an invalid contract of release, A was allowed to avoid such contract.¹¹

If the person subjected to duress is thereby compelled to perform or agree to perform what he could have been compelled to do legally, such transaction or contract cannot be avoided for duress. Thus if one who has injured another is compelled by duress to compensate to no greater extent than the law would have compelled him for such injury,¹ as by giving to the person from whom he has embezzled a note to cover such embezzlement,² no duress exists. So an assignee for the benefit of creditors cannot plead duress of his assignor to avoid a conveyance to pay an honest debt.³ Some courts, however, take the opposite view.⁴ But if the contract caused by threats of prosecution is not one of restitution but is on some different subject matter duress exists though the promisor is guilty.⁵ Thus a threat to prosecute for selling liquor unlawfully,⁶ or for giving testimony alleged to be perjured,⁷ may be duress, and notes induced thereby may be avoided.

§257. Other threats as duress.

Threats or conduct which do not involve violence, imprisonment and the like cannot usually constitute duress. If the conduct apprehended will cause merely vexation and annoyance,¹ as a threat to convey or lease property unless the grantor will accept a reconveyance and assume a mortgage thereon,² or mere importunity by a creditor to obtain security for his debt, though causing worry and excitement thereby,³ or a fear that one's father will be angry and will refuse to support him,⁴ a fear that control of a corporation will be lost unless stock is bought at an excessive price,⁵ or merely demanding settlement of a claim in a rough manner and insisting on prompt action,⁶ a threat to manage a corporation in an improper manner,⁷ or the fact that a chattel mortgage already given to secure rent prevents the mortgagor from moving his goods out of the township to the farm that he has rented,⁸ none of them constitute duress. The doctrine of duress is carried farther by some courts than is here indicated. Thus where A charged his employe B, with appropriating A's money, and told B's mother C, and threatened to inform his father D, it was held that on these facts alone duress might exist if D was in such physical condition that C feared that such information might cause him to become insane and to prevent such worry and trouble, she gave a mortgage for B's debt, A being informed of D's condition and C's motives.⁹

III. RELATION OF PARTIES.

§258. By whom duress may be committed.

Where a contract is induced by duress, the question of the relation of the party guilty of duress to the contract thus induced is often decisive of the rights of the party subjected to such duress. (1) If the adversary party to the contract is guilty of such duress, the party subjected thereto may of course avoid the contract induced thereby.¹ (2) If the party guilty of duress is the agent of the adversary party to the contract, the part subjected to duress may avoid such contract, even if the agent had no authority to commit such duress.² This rule rests on the principle that if the principal accepts the benefit of the contract made by the agent on his behalf, he takes it subject to all defenses. (3) If the person guilty of duress acts in collusion with the adversary party to the contract, the party subjected to duress may avoid such contract.³ (4) If the person who is guilty of duress is acting on behalf of the adversary party⁴ duress may be interposed as a defense against such adversary party. (5) If the person guilty of duress is not the adversary party or his agent, and is acting neither in collusion with such adversary party nor on behalf of him, but is acting entirely for his own benefit, a different question arises as to the right of the party subject to such duress to avoid the contract as against an adversary party who took no part in such duress.

(a) If the facts constituting duress, and inducing the contract are known to the adversary party to the contract, the party subjected thereto may avoid the contract.⁵ Thus where A is coerced by threats of violence from a mob of his employees to execute a deed of assignment to B for the benefit of A's creditors, and B through his agent C, who knows the facts accepts the deed, duress exists whereby the contract and deed may be avoided.⁶ So where defendant had been arrested with his sons on a charge of murder, and he had been released and his sons remanded, and strong popular feeling and excitement existed, it was held that duress existed where by reason of such facts the attorney for the accused sons compelled defendant to give a note and mortgage for three thousand dollars as an attorney's fee.⁷ (b) If the facts constituting duress and inducing the contract are not known to the adversary party the weight of authority is that the party subject to the duress cannot avoid such contract.⁸ Thus duress exercised by a husband to compel his wife to sign a mortgage⁹ or note¹⁰ does not avoid such instrument as to an adversary party who did not know of such duress, nor is it duress when the wife's fear of criminal prosecution of her husband is induced by information received from him and not by the threats of his creditor.¹¹ An exception to this general rule exists in some states by whose laws a homestead can be conveyed only by the free and unconstrained act of husband and wife acting together. In such states if the husband by duress compels the wife to mortgage the homestead, such mortgage is void even though the mortgagee is ignorant of such duress.¹²

Some courts, however, hold the general rule to be that the party subject to duress may avoid the contract even if the adversary party is ignorant of such duress.¹³ Thus where A compelled his wife B, by threats to assign to C a policy on A's life, payable to B, C who took it as collateral to secure A's debt was not allowed to hold the policy as against B.¹⁴ So where a husband by threats compelled his wife to sign a mortgage, she was allowed to avoid such mortgage even though the mortgagee was ignorant of such duress.¹⁵

If the transaction induced by duress is collateral to that in litigation and to which duress is pleaded as a defense, such defense is insufficient.¹⁶ Thus where A was attacked by robbers who threatened to kill him unless he paid them a large amount of money, and A borrowed such amount from B and paid the robbers under duress, it was held that B could recover such loan from A if free from collusion with the robbers.¹⁷

§259. Relation of party subjected to duress to party against whom violence or threats are directed.

Where the promisor himself is subjected to duress of imprisonment,¹ or to threats which can cause duress,² such as threats of violence³ or of imprisonment,⁴ duress of course may exist.

While Gillespie v. Simpson, (Ark.); 18 S. W. 1050, seems to recognize this doctrine, the case was in fact decided on the theory that no duress in fact existed, and that the contract was, furthermore, ratified.

Where the person against whom such threats and the like are directed is not the promisor, the general rule is that the promisor cannot in law be said to be subject to duress.⁵ Exceptions to this last rule exist where the promisor occupies certain relations to the person against whom the threats, violence and the like are directed. Thus imprisonment⁶ or threatened criminal prosecution and imprisonment⁷ of a husband may cause duress of the wife. The same rule was applied where a woman was induced by threats of arresting her intended husband, made just before the marriage was to occur, to sign a promise to pay his debt.⁸ A threat of criminal prosecution and imprisonment of a child may amount to duress of his parents.⁹ So may actual imprisonment and danger of promisor's children,¹⁰ so threats of imprisoning a grandson may amount to duress of his grandmother.¹¹ Threatened prosecution and imprisonment of a son-in-law has been held to be ground in equity for avoiding notes and a deed of trust given by reason thereof to secure his debt.¹²

The party to the contract who enters into by reason of duress may take advantage of such duress to avoid liability under the contract.¹ As a general rule this privilege is personal to him and his legal representatives. The adversary party who is guilty of duress cannot avoid the contract by reason thereof.² A third person cannot set up such duress.³ A creditor of the party subjected to duress, who has attached property sold by the latter under duress, cannot avoid the contract for such duress.⁴

Whether duress exercised against the principal gives the surety an opportunity of avoiding the contract is a question upon which there is some conflict of authority. The view held by a majority of the courts is that the surety is bound though his principal executes the contract under duress, if the surety knows of such duress and is himself not under duress,¹ while if the surety does not know of such duress he is not bound,² since on suit by the creditor the principal could avoid the contract, leaving the surety bound and without recourse against the principal.³ Some courts hold in general terms that a surety is not bound if the principal signs under duress.⁴ It has also been held that a surety on a bond given without legal authority or in case of false imprisonment to obtain the principal's release, may plead such duress.⁵

IV. EXISTENCE OF DURESS AS A FACT.

§263. Conduct not inducing action not duress.

Conduct which might amount to duress if the mind of the person against whom it is directed were affected thereby is not duress if it does not affect the mind of such person. Thus threats which might amount to duress, if they were effective will not constitute duress if they do not influence the conduct of the person against whom they are directed,¹ as where he chargeable with duress exercised by a third person of which he is not informed.

executes such instrument deliberately on advice of counsel² or of friends,³ or enters into the contract for other reasons than the threats, acting on the advice of his friends,⁴ or after such delay as gives full time to decide with deliberation,⁵ as where a father-in-law gave notes and a deed to settle a claim of embezzlement against his son-in-law after trying to obtain a compromise, and after an agreement with his daughter that the amount thus paid should be considered an advancement to her.⁶

Accordingly whatever may be the effect of mere persuasion as undue influence, it cannot amount to duress.⁷ It has been held that the violence or threat relied on must be the sole cause of the conduct sought to be avoided to constitute duress. If fraud is shown to have caused such conduct in part, duress does not exist.⁸

§264. Absence of threats.

If the only duress claimed to exist is duress of threats, the fact that no threats were in fact made shows that no duress exists,¹ even though the party executing the instrument did so because of facts rendering him, or some other person whose danger could in law influence him,² liable to criminal prosecution,³ as where a mother pays for goods taken by her daughter,⁴ or where a father pays a claim against his son for assault and battery⁵ if no threats are made. Where a criminal action has been in fact instituted, a mortgage given in settlement of the fund embezzled is not given under duress where it is expressly stated that such payment cannot affect the civil action.⁶ Abusive and insulting language not expressing or implying a threat cannot constitute duress.⁷ However an implied threat of criminal prosecution of one's husband⁸ may be as effective duress as an express threat.

V. EFFECT OF DURESS.

Duress like fraud, misrepresentation, mistake and non-disclosure, may affect the execution or the inducement. Duress in the execution is rare. It exists where the party subjected thereto is coerced into permitting a contract, written and signed by himself to be taken from him without intending to deliver it.¹ In cases like this, duress is operative only to rebut the inference of voluntary delivery that otherwise would exist. Such form of duress makes the contract void. Many text-writers suggest that duress in the formation may exist in oral contracts where the party subjected to duress is compelled to repeat words which of themselves would constitute a contract, without any intention of being bound thereby. While adjudicated cases on this point are uncommon, the view seems probable, in analogy to contracts made in jest.²

Duress in the inducement exists where the party subject to the duress knows the terms of the contract into which he is entering and intends such contract to take effect, but such intention is caused by duress. Duress of this sort makes contracts and conveyances executed thereunder voidable and not void.¹ On the one hand they may be made void at the election of the party subjected to duress. Thus deeds² or mortgages³ may be avoided for duress; but such formal conveyances cannot be avoided informally by acts in pais. A formal decree of rescission must be obtained from a court of equity.⁴ An executory contract⁵ such as a promissory note,⁶ a contract to surrender a child,⁷ or a contract to ship cattle⁸ may be avoided for duress in pais without formal rescission in equity. lease given under duress may be avoided informally and suit may be brought on the original cause of action.⁹ If the instrument is negotiable¹⁰ equity may grant a formal rescission. An executed contract whereby the title to personal property has passed may be avoided informally, such as an assignment of a policy of life insurance.¹¹ A specific existing chattel parted with by sale under duress may on informal rescission be seized by the vendor, and such recaption is not larceny.¹² In case of certain formal transfers of personal property such as stocks¹³ formal rescission may be had in equity. An executed conveyance of realty cannot be avoided by acts in pais followed by an ejectment suit. A suit in equity is necessary.¹⁴

§267. Duty of placing adversary party in statu quo.

On avoiding a contract for duress, it is necessary to return what was received under the contract thus avoided.¹ But where a wife gave a note and mortgage under duress to prevent the prosecution of her husband for forging collateral to a note given by him, and such note and collateral are returned to the wife to be delivered to her husband, which is done, she may avoid her note and mortgage without returning his notes and collateral; her husband being dead and the notes and collateral missing.² If the thing received by the party subjected to duress is worthless, it is not necessary to restore it before bringing action. It is sufficient to restore it at the trial.³ If the party subjected to duress has on his own theory of the case a right to all that he has received under the contract and more: while under the adversary party's theory of the case, he has a right to what he has received he is not obliged to tender it on disaffirming. Thus A had a claim against an insurance company which under threat of criminal prosecution she settled for a much smaller sum. It was held that she could disaffirm and sue for the difference between the amount due and the amount received; and that she need not return the amount received before bringing suit.⁴

If duress in the execution exists, even a negotiable contract in the hands of bona fide holders is void.¹

If duress in the inducement exists, a contract made thereunder is voidable only. It follows that it cannot be avoided if negotiable and in the hands of a bona fide purchaser for value before maturity.² If the purchaser takes with notice of the duress, the promisor may avoid the contract.³

If the contract is executed and passes title to realty a conveyance made under duress cannot be avoided as against a bona fide grantee for value, without notice.⁴ A subsequent judgment creditor of the grantee who has exercised duress, is not a bona fide purchaser within the meaning of this rule even if he acquires his lien without notice.⁵

On the other hand the person subjected to duress may see fit to ratify the transaction, and may do so after having become competent to contract.¹ Thus a deed given under duress may be ratified, as by a quitclaim,² or by acquiescence for an unreasonable time after an opportunity to avoid the contract,³ or by suing in tort to recover damages for the false imprisonment under which the deed was executed.⁴ An executory promise made under duress may be ratified after the duress has ceased to operate,⁵ as by express agreement to perform the contract⁶ or by voluntary performance,⁷ or by acquiescence therein.⁸ To constitute ratification the acts done must be done by a party competent to contract. Ratification under duress, by making payments does not validate an instrument given under duress.⁹ Thus a part payment made while the duress still is operating does not amount to a ratification.¹⁰

CONSIDERATION.

I. HISTORY OF CONSIDERATION.

§270. History of the doctrine of consideration.

The doctrine of consideration is in its present form and extent a late arrival in the law administered in England by the King's Courts. The reason for this, like so much history of English Law, is to be found in the forms of action by which relief had to be sought in the King's Courts.

The action of debt was always based upon a claim for something of value received by the defendant from the plaintiff, for which the plaintiff sought compensation.¹ Consideration was therefore necessarily present in every such action, as the foundation and basis thereof. Its inevitable appearance prevented discussion of its nature and necessity.

When the action of covenant finally took definite form² consideration was unnecessary and immaterial, because the courts enforced the contract under seal as a formal contract.³

With the development of the action of assumpsit, the doctrine of consideration became of the highest practical importance. If the courts were to enforce promises not under seal, and not based on antecedent debts, the question was what promises should be enforced? Should actions for non-performance of all promises, even gratuitous ones, be maintained? If some promises were to be selected as enforceable, which were they? These questions were complicated by the form of action necessary in case of breach of executory simple contracts. We have already seen that this form of action was trespass on the case,⁴ and that it was long before assumpsit was differentiated from trespass on the case.⁵ Now as long as assumpsit was, by reason of the form of action used, confused with tort—a confusion most natural since trespass on the case was originally an action *ex delicto*⁶ it was difficult to state, in abstract general language, why consideration should be necessary in trespass on the case when brought on a promise, while it was not necessary in trespass on the case when brought on a tort.⁷ Still the practice of the courts was more in conformity to the views of Modern Law than their theories. In the leading case in which it was held that an executory simple contract was enforceable, irrespective of partial performance,⁸ it seems to have been felt that the declaration would be defective charging defendant with breach of contract to build a mill, if it did not declare clearly what the promisee was to give for doing it.⁹ In the same reign we find consideration under the name of quid pro quo, assumed to be essential to an enforceable simple contract.¹⁰ It is, however, hard to build up an affirmative proposition from negative precedents. Was a consideration essential to every simple executory contract, or were there some types of such contract enforceable without consideration? The question remained open so long that Blackstone could say¹¹ and Lord Mansfield could

² "Perhaps we may doubt whether in the thirteenth century a purely gratuitous promise, though made in a sealed instrument, would have been enforced if its gratuitous character had stood openly revealed." Pollock and Maitland History of English Law, Vol. II., 213, 214 (second edition).

mere verbal promises, for which no good reason could be assigned, it therefore does not hold in some cases where such promise is authentically proved by written documents. For if a man enters into a voluntary bond, or gives a promissory note, he shall not be allowed to aver the want of a consideration in order to evade the payment: for every bond from the solemnity of the instrument and every note from the subscription of the drawer, carries hold in obiter,¹² that the rule requiring consideration applied to "mere verbal promises." It was soon decided, however, that consideration was necessary in all executory simple contracts whether oral or written,¹³ a decision which has been followed so often as to have become an elementary proposition.¹⁴ It is interesting, however, to note the narrow escape of this doctrine in the middle of the eighteenth century, and to observe that the courts long felt it necessary to emphasize the need of consideration in unsealed written contracts,¹⁵ or on the other hand, they excepted mercantile paper from the general rule requiring consideration.¹⁶

II. GENERAL THEORY OF CONSIDERATION.

§271. Consideration and subject-matter.

Every contract must have consideration and subject-matter.¹ This oft-repeated proposition is elementary; but often as it has been used, little distinction has been made between subject-matter and consideration. Some authorities regard subject-matter as including everything bargained for on both sides; but it is more common to say or to assume that the subject-matter must exist on one side, and the consideration on the other. Where this view is entertained, there can be logically no distinction between the subject-matter and the consideration, for the right acquired by one may be regarded as either subject-matter or consideration, as we please, leaving the right acquired on the other side to be classed under the alternative. This is best illustrated where the contract consists of reciprocal promises, where it is a matter of arbitrary choice which we class as consideration and which as subject-matter. When a contract reaches litigation there is always a promise made by one party which the other party claims is valid and unperformed in whole or in part. If the question of a want of consideration is raised, the claim of the promisor is that no consideration exists for his promise. Whatever difficulty, therefore, may exist at the outset in determining which the consideration is, there is generally no difficulty in determining what constitutes the alleged consideration in a contract in litigation as, if any exists, it is the thing of value given in return for the promise which it is sought to enforce.

It is customary in treating the subject to discuss question of the existence and reality of the right or forbearance in question under the head of consideration; while questions of legality, impossibility and the like are classed under subject-matter. To avoid a reduplication of topics, and to avoid departing unnecessarily from the customary arrangement of contract law, this order will be followed substantially; observing, however, that except for mere convenience, there seems no reason why subject-matter and consideration should not be treated together as one topic.

§272. Good and valuable considerations.

Considerations are of two kinds, good and valuable. A good consideration consists of natural love and affection, which in law is equivalent to ties of blood or marriage, as between husband and wife,¹ or between one and his lineal descendants as children,² or grandchildren,³ but not

² Oliphant v. Liversidge, 142 Ill. 160; 30 N. E. 334; Hutsell v. Crewse, 138 Mo. 1; 39 S. W. 449; Carney v. Carney, 196 Pa. St. 34; 46 Atl. 264; Ferguson's Appeal, 117 Pa. St. 426; 11 Atl. 885 (including step-children); Schneitter v. Carman, 98 Ia. 276; 67 N. W. 249

(and including the spouses of such children); Bell v. Scammon, 15 N. H. 381; 41 Am. Dec. 706. A conveyance by a child to a parent may be based on love and affection and past support. Carney v. Carney, 196 Pa. St. 34; 46 Atl. 264.

A good consideration is sufficient in equity to support an executed conveyance,⁶ but is not sufficient in law or equity to support an executory promise. For most practical purposes it has no place in the law of contract.⁷

But in equity it is recognized to a very limited extent. Thus where a father gave notes under seal in escrow to each of his daughters, and by inadvertence omitted the seal from one, it was held that equity would recognize the note as on consideration so as to reform it by adding the seal and enforcing the note against his estate.⁸ Where an administratrix gave her own mortgage to her father for a debt of her deceased husband's in consideration of certain assets of his in her hands, it was held that in the particular case the assets were too small to afford any substantial consideration; but that the mortgage would be upheld in equity as an executed conveyance, and on consideration of blood.⁹

If the contract is on a valuable consideration, the fact that affection is an additional consideration will not invalidate the contract.¹⁰ As a general rule, however, it may be said that the valuable consideration hereafter defined¹¹ is the only consideration known to the law of contract.

This proposition is so thoroughly settled in most jurisdictions that it has become an elementary principle rarely presented to the courts except when the absence of consideration is in some way disguised.⁴ Thus a promise to extend the time of payment of a debt due is unenforceable if made without consideration.⁵ So a promise to extend the time of an option is unenforceable.⁶ So a promise to release salary already due,⁷ a promise by an embezzling treasurer to repay in addition to his own shortage that made by his predecessor,⁸ a promise to make a testamentary disposition of property,⁹ a promise by A to divide certain property with his father,¹⁰ a promise to release one from a contract,¹¹ a promise to lend money,¹² a promise not to sue,¹³ a promise to assign a mortgage,¹⁴ a promise to waive a lien,¹⁵ a promise to pay premiums on a life insurance policy payable to another,¹⁶ a promise to deal with a certain firm exclusively,¹⁷ a promise to pay an annuity,¹⁸ a promise to pay commissions without service in return,¹⁹ a promise to give to another a share of profits in an enterprise to which such other contributes nothing,²⁰ or to cancel notes,²¹ or to surrender a bill of lading,²² are none of them enforceable where nothing was given or promised in return. The practical experience of a new stockholder is no consideration for the corporation's pledging its property to secure his note given for the stock.²³ So in a renewal of a contract, void for want of consideration, the original contract is no consideration for the new one.²⁴ Such a contract cannot be made valid by ratification unless a valuable consideration for such ratification exists.²⁵ Consideration does not seem to be necessary at the Civil Law.²⁶ Thus the existence of A's debt to B is a consideration for C's promise to pay it.²⁷

A valuable consideration is some legal right acquired by the promisor in consideration of his promise, or foreborne by the promisee in consideration of such promise.¹ A common form of stating the same principle is that a valuable consideration for a promise may consist of a benefit to the promisor,² or a detriment to the promisee.³

The use of "benefit" and "detriment" in this connection needs explanation. While correct if properly understood, it is liable to misconstruction. "Benefit" does not refer to any pecuniary gain arising out of the transaction, nor "detriment" to any pecuniary loss.⁴ It is not possible to wait till the transaction is concluded and the books balanced, to see whether a consideration existed originally. "Benefit" as used in this rule means that the promisor has, in return for his promise, acquired some legal right to which he would not otherwise have been entitled; "detriment" means that the promisee has, in return for the promise forborne some legal right which he would otherwise have been entitled to exercise. The question of the ultimate financial loss or gain is foreign to the doctrine of consideration, if the parties each have received what they have agreed upon. This proposition, though found in what are necessarily obiter,⁵ cannot from its very breadth be illustrated by adjudicated cases except in fragments.⁶ Thus services rendered under contract to compensate for getting a majority of the property owners fronting on a street to sign a petition for paving the street, are a consideration, even though the petition prepared by the employer is so defective as to be ineffective.⁷ So a promise to lend money on certain storage receipts up to a certain amount is a consideration even though the promisee did not need the money and did not borrow it.⁸ So a sale of personalty which proves to be worthless is a consideration if there is no fraud, mistake, breach of warranty and the like.⁹ So a conveyance of property encumbered by liens which exceed the price ultimately brought for such property on a resale is a valuable consideration.¹⁰ Two groups of topics, remote from consideration as an element of the formation of a contract, are often confused with it. One group consists of facts such as fraud, misrepresentation or mistake, by which the contract in question is rendered either void or voidable. In case of this sort the acquisition or forbearance of a legal right is immaterial. Under the circumstances already discussed¹¹ one of these facts will prevent the formation of a valid contract though a valuable consideration may be present. The other group consists of topics to be treated subsequently under the head of discharge.¹² If the right acquired by one party is the executory promise of the other, this forms a valuable consideration.¹³ The failure of the promisor to do what he agreed to do cannot retroact and make the contract a nullity from the beginning. It has, therefore, nothing to do with the formation of the contract. The fact that it is termed "failure of consideration," and that in some cases it may discharge to the party not

§275. Consideration and motive.

While consideration is the legal motive for a promise, a motive for a promise may exist and yet not amount to a consideration.¹ Thus a desire to protect a husband's reputation,² or to support an illegitimate child,³ or a desire to equalize distribution of maker's estate⁴ are not considerations. Indeed, if a motive alone were equivalent to a consideration, every promise made free from fraud, duress and the like would necessarily be enforceable without any consideration.

§276. To whom or from whom consideration must move.

Stating the rule given in the preceding section in the form that consideration must be a "benefit" to the promisor, or a "detriment" to the promisee, we observe that in most cases the same thing that is the "benefit" to the promisor is also a "detriment" to the promisee, the former acquiring what the latter parts with.¹ This, however, is not necessary. It is sufficient if there is a benefit to the promisor, without any "detriment" to the promisee, as where a third person gives something of value to the promisor in return for his promise to the promisee.² Payment by a third person not already bound is a valuable consideration.³ Thus a check of a third person is a consideration for a promise to stay execution.⁴ So payment of part of a debt by a third person is a consideration for a release of the entire debt.⁵ Thus payment out of a relief fund is consideration for release of a right of action against a railroad.⁶ So if A is indebted to B, and A, B and C agree that A shall pay such amount to C and shall be discharged from liability to B, there is a consideration for A's promise in the discharge of his debt to B. It is not necessary that there should be any consideration between B and C nor any moving from C to A.⁷ It is equally sufficient if there is a "detriment" to the promisee without any "benefit" to the promisor.⁸ Thus a discharge of a debt due from a third person to the promisee,⁹ or a claim in tort,¹⁰ or forbearance to sue for a certain time on a debt due from a third person,¹¹ a waiver of a right to rescind a contract with a third person on account

So extension of credit by A to B is consideration for C's promise to A to guarantee B's debt.²³ Thus permission to a national bank by the comptroller to resume business and a restoration of the directors of the bank to their lawful relations with it is consideration for a contract by which a third person furnished collateral to secure excessive loans made by a bank to a director.²⁴ So a promise by a grantee of realty to pay a debt of the grantor's to a third person finds sufficient consideration in the conveyance to such grantee.²⁵ So a promise by a remainder-man to pay a debt of the life tenant's is sufficient consideration for a promise by the life tenant to pay interest to the remainder-man.²⁶ The release by one creditor of a part of a debt is consideration for an agreement by another creditor of the same debtor to release a part of his debt.²⁷ So where A, a physician, entered into a contract with B and C, whereby A bought B's practice, and B and C both agreed not to compete with A, C's promise was supported by a sufficient consideration.²⁸

The doctrines discussed so far in this section are often modified by the doctrines of status. Thus where a married woman can contract only for her separate estate, a release of a claim by a third person against her husband for assault, is no consideration for her promise in some jurisdictions.²⁹ So promises by her, to pay her husband's debts are without consideration, even if a detriment to the promisee exists.³⁰ This question is also unfortunately complicated with the question of whether a promise made by A to B upon consideration moving from B to A, whereby A agrees to do something for C's benefit can be enforced by C.³¹ Some courts hold that C cannot sue on such contract.³² Unfortunately these courts have expressed this view in the form that a consideration moving to the promisor from a third person will not support the promise. This rule has been laid down by the English courts³³ and is followed in some of the United States.³⁴ Thus a contract by A with B, whereby A agreed to convey realty to a corporation X to place the stock in B's hands for sale, and to pay B a commission for effecting such sale, the proceeds of the sale to be placed to the credit of the corporation was held to be without consideration as to A.³⁵ So a contract by A to pay to B a certain sum if a suit against X was dismissed, was held to be without consideration.³⁶ The two questions are really distinct, and the confusion between them is most unfortunate. In the one case, the promisee sues, in the other, a third person not a party to the contract. Accordingly even in States that lay down the rule that a consideration moving from a third party to the promisor is insufficient, it is held that a promise by A to B on consideration that B will convey to A land belonging to C,³⁷ or that C will convey to A certain realty³⁸ are each on valuable consideration. Even in England this rule has proved so unmanageable as to necessitate at least two exceptions. (1) It has no application to accommodation paper, executed by parties who do not all receive the consideration.³⁹ (2) In compositions of creditors the promises of the creditors each to accept a less amount for his debt than that owing to him, are held to be a

§277. Consideration must be that contemplated by offer and acceptance.

In discussing all the types of consideration, it must be kept in mind that consideration is an essential element of a contract, and not something foreign to it and outside of it; that the consideration invoked to support the contract must be that contemplated by the offer and acceptance,¹ and that consideration does not dispense with offer and acceptance.

Accordingly if the offer is such as to require a communication of acceptance, and no such communication is made to the offerer, there is no contract, and the subsequent voluntary act or forbearance, even though exactly what was required by the offer, is not a consideration, as there is no contract in which it can be an element. Actual forbearance without any previous promise to forbear² is no consideration, since no obligation to forbear rested on the party who forbears. So the assumption of an obligation, as voluntarily assuming a debt after a deed was delivered, which assumption was not required as a term of delivery,³ or payment of a draft,⁴ or marriage,⁵ are not considerations for promises if not made in reliance thereon, under an acceptance thereof. So where A let B take certain property on consideration that B would give A B's note, with C as surety, and C signed after the transaction without knowing of the transaction between A and B, A knowing that C did not know, no consideration for C's promise exists.⁶

The cases given can be explained on the theory that there was really no contract between the parties. Similar states of fact can be explained on the theory of a lack of mutuality.⁷ Thus where A promised B to leave him all his property if B would remain near him so as to assist him if needed, B did not promise, but did so remain, A's promise was held unenforceable against A's estate, as wanting in mutuality.⁸ There is no inconsistency between these two theories. In most cases where mutuality is wanting, there is no offer and acceptance, and consequently no consideration for either promise.

If a gratuitous promise is made, the subsequent act of the promisee in conferring a favor upon the promisor voluntarily and gratuitously cannot be invoked as a consideration for such promise. Thus where A promised B, without consideration, to extend the time of payment of a debt, B's subsequent act of paying interest voluntarily a few days before it was due is no consideration for A's promise.⁹ If the contract for extension of time calls for payment of part of the debt when due, no consideration exists, though payment is in fact made to the bank holding the note for collection and credit given on such note a day before it is due.¹⁰ A recent case which apparently ignores this principle is one in which A gave his relative, B, A's note so that B need not work any more. It was not stipulated that B should resign her position, but B did so after the delivery of the note. The court held that if no consideration really existed, there were at least principles of equitable estoppel which made the note enforceable.¹¹

The terms of the offer, however, may be such that the offer can be accepted only by doing some specified act; and it may not even require that notice of doing such act be communicated to the offerer.¹² Thus in subscriptions, the incurring of liabilities may be acceptance and consideration in one, without a previous promise to incur them.¹³

A consideration may be agreed upon as well impliedly, as expressly. Thus if an agreement for forbearance for a reasonable time can be inferred from the conduct of the parties, forbearance is as much a consideration as if it had been expressly stipulated for.¹⁴ A guaranty to pay the note of another a certain time after maturity, with actual forbearance for that time, may justify a finding of an agreement to delay for such time.¹⁵ So a promise by a materialman to waive his lien is

While a consideration is a necessary element of every contract, it is not necessary that each separate promise or covenant should have a distinct consideration. If there is but one consideration offered in return for several promises, and it is accepted for them together, it will support them.¹ This principle is often invoked in questions of mutuality of obligation.² If A gives value for two or more promises from B, B cannot claim that one of such promises was not mutual, though the parties have not apportioned the consideration to the separate promises.³ Thus a purchase of railroad bonds is a consideration for a promise of such railroad to ship by a certain connect-things, but as consideration for agreeing to do what he is thus bound in law to do he exacts a further promise from A. In such cases B's promise is no consideration for A's further promise. An illustration of this principle is found where B, a common carrier, requires A, a shipper, to assent to a limitation of B's Common-Law liability before he agrees to transport B's goods at regular rates. In such cases B's agreement to relieve A from his Common-Law liability is held in many States to be without consideration.¹⁶

§279. Presumption of consideration.

At Common Law negotiable contracts are said to import a consideration; that is, in the absence of evidence on the point it will be presumed that there was a sufficient consideration; and it is for the party denying the existence of a consideration to show that there was none.¹ This is true even if no consideration is recited on the face of the instrument, and words such as "value received" are wanting.² Thus an agreement to waive protest and a guaranty of prompt payment in a contract of indorsement made before delivery is prima facie on valuable consideration.³ This rule is prima facie only. If it is shown that no consideration existed, the negotiable instrument is unenforceable,⁴ even if reciting a consideration.⁵

Consideration is not imported by contracts which, while negotiable in form, are not negotiable in law, such as the promissory note of an imbecile.⁶ By an extension of the original rule, property pledged for the debt of another is prima facie pledged on valuable consideration.⁷

In the absence of statute, a written contract as such does not import a consideration,⁸ at least where no consideration is recited therein.⁹ Thus a written stipulation that payment of a given note should be extended to a certain time does not import a consideration, as such stipulation is not a negotiable instrument.¹⁰ So a written contract to pay the debt of another does not import a consideration.¹¹ A written contract reciting that it is "for value received" imports a consideration.¹² Thus a written guaranty on the back of a note imports a consideration if one is recited therein.¹³ Such recital is prima facie only and may be rebutted.¹⁴

By statute in some jurisdictions written contracts as a class import a consideration.¹⁵ In some states this is true of any direct promise to pay money.¹⁶ Even under such statutes, no such presumption exists where the written contract shows affirmatively that no consideration exists.¹⁷ It has been held that the recital of a consideration in a contract estops the parties to deny the existence of a consideration.¹⁸ Thus the recital of one dollar as a consideration is held to make the contract enforceable, as such sum may be collected.¹⁹ An oral promise does not import a consideration.²⁰ The foregoing propositions apply only to simple contracts. The so-called presumption of consideration in contracts under seal is discussed elsewhere.²¹

§280. Consideration unnecessary by statute.

The rule requiring consideration in executory contracts is a rule of Common Law and equity, which are both subordinate to Statute Law. If the legislature sees fit to provide a means at law of enforcing promises which lack consideration, such promises are valid contracts. The chief examples of such contracts are public grants and subscriptions to the stock of corporations to be formed. A legislative grant needs no consideration other than the public good as viewed by the legislature.¹ Where persons subscribe to corporations to be formed, there is no adversary party to the contract and nothing then in existence to serve as a consideration. There is not even an enforceable promise to issue the stock, since the company which is to issue it does not exist. Yet by general incorporation acts subscriptions to stock must be made before the corporation can be created. While it is sometimes sought to find a legal consideration in such subscriptions,² the most logical view is that by statute such subscriptions become enforceable on the formation of the corporation, without any consideration.³ Where a statute requires a bond and provides what liability shall attach upon executing such bond, no consideration is necessary to support it.⁴

If a contract is fully performed on both sides and each has received what he agreed to take, the question of consideration becomes immaterial. While it is sometimes said that an executed contract needs no consideration, this is a misuse of language. If no consideration ever existed there never was a contract. It is more correct to say that a promise, if fully performed,¹ even of a promise to make a gift,² cannot after performance be rescinded by the promisor because he could have resisted performance successfully. This is true in gifts executed by delivery, even if the donor subsequently regains possession of the gift.³

III. TYPES OF CONSIDERATION.

§282. Conveyance of rights in realty.

A transfer of property rights in realty is a valuable consideration.¹ Even a conveyance of the mere legal title is a consideration. Thus a conveyance of property to be held in trust is a consideration for a promise by trustee to undertake the trust.² The conveyance need not be in fee. Thus the assignment of a lease,³ even if voidable by re-entry by grantor,⁴ the surrender of rentals of realty to a lienholder,⁵ and a contract between landlord and tenant to work land on shares,⁶ are each valuable considerations. Release of contingent interests in realty is a valuable consideration; such as the release of a husband's interest in his wife's property,⁷ or a wife's inchoate right of dower,⁸ or of homestead and dower,⁹ or the interest of a grantee by deed in escrow.¹⁰ Some jurisdictions hold that an heir's transfer of his possible right in his ancestor's estate by descent is a consideration.¹⁰ If such interest passes by a warranty deed it will pass whatever interest descends to the heir, and is a consideration.¹¹ If such interest passes by a warranty deed no interest of any sort passes,¹³ and such conveyance is no consideration. So the conveyance of an equitable interest,¹⁴ such as an equity of redemption,¹⁵ or a right to redeem from a tax sale,¹⁶ or rights under an executory contract for the sale of certain realty,¹⁷ or a transfer by a defective deed good in equity,¹⁸ is a consideration. So a conveyance of mere possessory rights, such as the surrender of a timber culture entry,¹⁹ or a homestead entry,²⁰ a promise by one holding under a homestead entry to perfect his title and give a new mortgage,²¹ or a promise to assign a claim to an entry on land on affirmance of the decision of the Transfer of possession in bailment is consideration for a promise made by the bailee.²⁴ So a loan of a painting for competitive exhibition at a fair is a consideration for a promise to re-deliver it.²⁵

§284. Change of form of obligation.

A change in the form of a debt is a consideration for a promise based upon such change. Thus the giving of a note for a debt which was not before evidenced by a negotiable instrument is a consideration.¹ The giving of security for a pre-existing debt,² such as a chattel mortgage,³ even if in fact nothing is realized from such security⁴ is a valuable consideration.

§285. Work and labor.

Performing work and labor which the party performing was not otherwise bound to do forms a consideration for a promise made in return for such work and labor.¹ Examples of such considerations are agreements either express² or implied,³ to work as agent, doing work not called for by pre-existing contract,⁴ perfecting a patent,⁵ sinking an oil well,⁶ and furnishing water to cattle.⁷

So furnishing service by quasi-public corporations, such as by a water-works company,⁸ or a gas company,⁹ operating a street railway,¹⁰ or changing the service from horse cars to electric cars,¹¹ are considerations. If the party performing the services agrees in advance not to make any charge therefor, the opportunity to work is a consideration for his promise to work gratuitously, insofar that after doing the work he cannot charge

A forbearance of any legal right may be a consideration.¹ The right forborne is usually a legal right to property of some sort, either in possession or in action.² Thus release of a note,³ a release of a guarantor's right to sue the maker of the note,⁴ a release of a pre-existing debt,⁵ especially if secured,⁶ or release of liability on a bond⁷ are all considerations. A release of a claim not originating on contract is a consideration.⁸ A release by A of a claim for goods stolen by B and used in C's business without C's knowledge of the theft,⁹ or a release of a claim time, followed by forbearance for a reasonable time, is consideration for a third person's signing a certificate of deposit as surety to secure such indebtedness.¹⁰ These cases rest on the theory that from the facts given it can be inferred that the parties intended delay for a reasonable time.¹¹ If, on the other hand, such inference cannot be drawn, and if the promisee did not agree, expressly or impliedly, to give an extension of time, and could have sued at any time without breaking his contract, actual extension of time is no consideration.¹² On the same principle a promise to delay a "short time" has been held no consideration.¹³ If, however, the party agreeing to extend the time is bound by such extension even for a short time such extension is a consideration. Thus extension of time for one day has been held a consideration.¹⁴ or to sue for personal injuries,⁵ or to sue on a bond,⁶ or on a note,⁷ or to enforce a lien,⁸ or the withdrawal of a claim on a fund held by the government,⁹ are considerations.

Thus if circumstances exist under which a wife has a claim against her husband for alimony, her forbearance to sue therefor is a valuable consideration.¹⁰ So a waiver of a right to sue for a violation of the provisions of a decree for alimony is a consideration.¹¹

Such contracts are not favorites of the law. If the separation is voluntary, the wife has no claim for alimony and her forbearance to sue is no consideration.¹²

If cohabitation continues, a promise by a wife to live harmoniously, manage the house properly and the like is a promise to do "just what is demanded by her marital relations," and therefore no consideration.¹³

Thus forbearance to sue is consideration for a promise not to plead limitations,¹⁴ or for a promise by a third person to pay such debt,¹⁵ or for a promise to pay the

Dismissal of an action instituted in good faith is a valuable consideration,¹ as discontinuance of attachment proceedings,² or a suit contesting a will,³ or the dismissal of a prosecution for removing goods of a debtor to prevent a levy.⁴ Thus such dismissal by A is consideration for B's promise to pay A's attorney's fees,⁵ or costs,⁶ or money.⁷

Abstinence from competition, whenever lawful, is a valuable consideration.¹ Thus lawful agreements to abstain from bidding at public sales,² or to refrain from competition in business,³ or to "pool" stock belonging to different owners,⁴ are valuable considerations.

A waiver of rights in a decedent's estate is a valuable consideration; such as an agreement between the heirs or next of kin for an amicable settlement of such estate,¹ or to waive claim for advancement,² or to waive a right to administer an estate,³ or to waive bona fide objections to the probate of a will.⁴ But waiver of an alleged right to contest a will, for which no ground exists, is no consideration.⁵

A waiver of a right to rescind a contract,¹ as for fraud,² or for breach by the adversary party,³ a waiver of a right to be released from a bond,⁴ as by surrender of the principal,⁵ or a waiver of a right to withdraw an offer,⁶ are all considerations.

A definite promise to refrain from attempting to obtain additional security has been held a consideration,⁷ and actually refraining from getting security without any agreement to refrain has been held a consideration.⁸

A waiver of exemptions,⁹ the waiver by an indorser of his right to demand and notice,¹⁰ a waiver of a right to declare dividends and an agreement to apply the surplus to making certain improvements,¹¹ and destroying an unrecorded assignment of a patent to revest the title in the assignor,¹² are valuable considerations. So A's promise to B, his broker, not to close his sales of stock to avoid loss, is a consideration for B's promise to carry the stock without further margin.¹³

§295. Waiver of rights not involving property.

The examples of benefits or detriments thus far given have been rights involving property directly or indirectly. Consideration, however, is not necessarily limited to rights of this kind. Any forbearance of any legal right is a consideration, though it may not and cannot involve financial loss to the party forbearing, or financial gain to the other. Even if the forbearance can be shown to be really beneficial to the party forbearing the right, the forbearance is nevertheless a consideration.¹ Thus a waiver of the right to use tobacco,² or to drink liquor, use tobacco, swear or play cards,³ or to abstain from the use of intoxicating liquor,⁴ a waiver by a parent of the right to name a child,⁵ surrender of the control of a child⁶ attending a university,⁷ a promise by a son not to move away,⁸ mutual agreements among merchants to close their stores at six thirty P. M.,⁹ a promise by one who has been intimate with a married woman beyond the limits of propriety, though not of morality, to influence her to return to her husband, and for himself to leave the country,¹⁰ are all considerations, though in almost every case it is impossible to discover any trace of financial loss or gain. In most of them, the promisee is clearly the gainer by his act or forbearance, and the promisor gets nothing of financial value.

Furnishing information,¹¹ attending a funeral,¹² going to Europe¹³ and guessing at the weight of a block of soap,¹⁴ are all examples of forbearance of legal rights which are considerations, though no financial loss may result to the promisee or gain to the promisor. The waiver by a city of the right to prohibit interment within city limits is consideration for a promise by a cemetery association not to charge more than a certain price for burial lots.¹⁵

If the promisor is willing to accept a promise in return for his promise, and does not insist on the performance of the act or forbearance stipulated for, such promise is as lawful a consideration as the doing of the thing promised would have been.¹ Thus a promise to sell land,² even if subject to vendor's ing credit to A on B's promise,¹⁶ are all considerations. So becoming security on the note of another is consideration for a promise of indemnity,¹⁷ especially where such promise is made by one primarily liable, to induce promisee to give his note to the former's creditor.¹⁸ So incurring expenses in litigation is a consideration for a promise by interested parties to give indemnity.¹⁹ So A's incurring expenses of a trip to Europe in reliance on B's promise to reimburse him therefor is a consideration for B's promise.²⁰ So a railroad's agreement to support in part a relief department for its employes is consideration for a promise by the employes to release rights of action for personal injury.²¹

lege,¹¹ a railroad,¹² a post-office,¹³ a manufacturing plant,¹⁴ holding an election,¹⁵ raising money by taxation to meet the terms of the subscription,¹⁶ giving a ball,¹⁷ assumption of certain debts by the trustees individually,¹⁸ and advances made by the trustees,¹⁹ if in accordance with the terms of the respective subscriptions and in reliance upon them. Past considerations do not make a subscription enforceable. Thus the work of a pastor of a church to obtain subscriptions is no consideration for subscriptions already made.²⁰ So a promise made by a subscriber to enable a college to pay its pre-existing debts lacks consideration.²¹

Consideration for subscriptions is sometimes sought in the mutual promises of the subscribers.²² If the offer is made by each of the subscribers to the others and is conditioned on their subscriptions, such mutual promises may be considerations each for the other.²³ If the promises are made to the payee, and are not conditioned on the other subscriptions, they form no consideration for each other, and any attempt to construe them as considerations is an attempt to make two independent gratuitous promises each a consideration for the other.²⁴

Consideration is also sought in the obligation of the donee to use the donation for the purpose specified.²⁵ But this obligation does not attach until the donation is paid in, and is nothing more than the legal duty resting upon the donee, which cannot be a consideration,²⁶ and is held not to be a consideration for a subscription.²⁷

If the donee undertakes more than the mere application of the donation to the purposes thereof, as where it promises to give "free tuition to twenty students forever,"²⁸ a consideration exists. If in return for their subscription, the donors are to receive something of value,²⁹ such as corporate stock,³⁰ or land,³¹ a consideration exists, as this is an executory contract of sale or something equivalent thereto.

Pending acceptance a subscription is in legal effect an offer, school lands and apply the income to school purposes,¹³ and a liability caused by a city's issuing valid warrants and then exhausting the fund by a misappropriation¹⁴ are all sufficient considerations to support an express promise based on such liability, made by the party liable therefor.¹⁵ Thus the receipt of assets of a decedent's estate liable to be taken for his debts is a consideration for a promise to pay such debts.¹⁶

If such promise is to perform the legal duty and something more, no consideration for the additional promise exists. If receipt of assets of a decedent's estate is the sole consideration for a promise to pay the debt of a decedent, such promise is not enforceable to the extent that it exceeds such assets.¹⁷ Of course if there is an additional consideration, promises to do more than the law requires are upon consideration. Hence if the claim against decedent's estate is released, there is a consideration for a promise to pay such claim whether the promisor receives assets or not.¹⁸ So if there is an agreement for an extension of time, extension forms a consideration for a promise to pay the debt personally, whether there were any assets or not.¹⁹ Thus a contract whereby a creditor of a decedent agrees to surrender notes given by such decedent in consideration of a promise by an heir to pay the holder interest thereon for life, has consideration.²⁰

There is a conflict of authority as to the effect of giving a note to take up a debt of decedent's; but the conflict arises not on questions of consideration, but on the question of the effect of such new note upon the prior debt. In some jurisdictions such new note does not discharge the prior debt or in any way affect it. The prior debt of decedent, cannot, therefore be a consideration for the new note.²¹ If the new note discharges decedent's debt, the debt is a consideration for the note.²² But the original liability must be discharged to afford a consideration for the new promise. Thus if A promises, before he obtains a discharge in bankruptcy, to pay a debt from which he is subsequently discharged and such debt remains in force, no consideration for the new promise exists.²³ So a written promise to pay a debt not then barred by limitations has no consideration if the original debt is still in force.²⁴

The pre-existing liability must be a real one, however. Thus where A had promised to make a gift to B, but such gift never took effect for want of delivery, A's subsequent promise to B,

IV. APPARENT CONSIDERATIONS.

§301. Apparent considerations which are non-existent.

While the parties to a contract may make such terms and select such consideration as they choose, the consideration selected must be the forbearance or acquisition of some legal right. If they select something which is not a legal right, the acquisition or forbearance of it constitutes no consideration, though the parties may believe otherwise. Thus a transfer of property is a consideration,¹ but if a vendor has no interest of any sort in such property an attempted conveyance thereof is no consideration. Thus a sale by an individual of vacant public land,² as where the vendor has neither possession of such land nor right therein³ and has merely hopes of getting such land,⁴ or a sale of improvements thereon,⁵ or of land to which the vendor holds a government homestead certificate which he has forfeited by abandoning the land before remaining there the necessary period of five years,⁶ are not considerations, and a promise to pay rent to one who has neither title, right of possession nor possession has no consideration.⁷ Forbearance, waiver and the like are considerations where a right is asserted in good faith,⁸ but if the forbearance is of what the promisee has no legal right to do,⁹ as an abandonment of an effort to obtain a change in the will of another,¹⁰ or a promise not to issue execution on an alleged judgment which clearly has no existence,¹¹ or satisfying an execution which has been perpetually enjoined,¹² or consent by one joint owner to a transfer of the interests of the other owners¹³ no consideration exists. So if there is no genuine dispute and no cause of action, a promise to forbear suit¹⁴ or a promise to waive a claim which is void and cannot be maintained in good faith¹⁵ are neither of them considerations. Thus the seduction or alienation of affections of a woman is no consideration for a note given by the seducer to her affianced.¹⁶

The principles which control in determining the validity of a promise as a consideration are substantially the same as those which apply to considerations in general. The promise must be such as to offer a legal right or the forbearance of a legal right to which the promisor would not otherwise have been entitled. On the one hand, it is not necessary that the contract, if in writing, be in one instrument in order to be mutually binding. The agreements may be in two separate written instruments¹ even though executed on different days² if in fact a part of the same transaction; or the agreement may be written on the one side and oral on the other.³

Neither is it necessary that each covenant on the one part have a corresponding obligation on the other, apportioned to that particular covenant,⁴ since one consideration can support several promises.⁵ Thus, where as part of the lease, lessor agreed to give lessee sixty days' notice of an intended sale, and to give him the first opportunity to purchase, such promise is valid though lessee did not agree to buy.⁶ So if A buys a certain lot of logs from B with a privilege of taking another amount at a specified price, a consideration for the contract exists.⁷

On the other hand, if the promise offers only what the promisor is already entitled to, there is no consideration.⁸ So if a promise does not offer any enforceable legal right or forbearance it is not a consideration. This principle is sometimes expressed in the rule that promises, in order to be a valid consideration each for the other, must be mutual.⁹

Mutuality of obligation may be lacking in at least three different classes of cases. In the first there does not purport to be any right conferred or forborne in return for the promise; in the second, there may be some apparently valid promise which on analysis does not by its terms fix any legal liability on the party making it; and in the third, the promise offered as a consideration does by its terms attempt to fix a real liability, but by reason of some extrinsic fact, as incapacity of the party making the promise, the illegality of the thing promised and the like, no enforceable liability attaches. These three classes of cases are not distinct in principle, but only in the manner in which the lack of consideration is more or less disguised. First; if by the terms of the agreement the promisor is not to receive for his promise any legal right or forbearance, his promise is without consideration and cannot be enforced.¹ Thus a promise to extend the time for the payment of a mortgage,² a promise by the payee of a note given for a pre-existing debt to renew the note when due,³ or to extend the time of payment of a debt,⁴ or a promise to reduce the rate of interest,⁵ are none of them enforceable if no promise in return, or other consideration, exists.

§304. Promise imposing no liability as consideration.

Where the parties assume to make a contract in which a promise is the consideration for a promise, and analysis shows that one of the promises does not impose any legal duty upon the party making it, such promise is not a consideration for the other promise.¹ This is what is often meant by saying that promises must be mutual. Illustrations of this principle are an agreement that a manufacturer will sell all his goods in a given locality through A, who is to get a specified commission, A not agreeing to do anything with reference to such sales,² specified time. Thus if the employee releases a claim for damages,⁹ or agrees to and does abandon other employment to enter upon the one in question,¹⁰ a consideration for the employer's promise exists. It is not necessary, however, that the contract should impose obligations expressly upon each party. It is sufficient if they are imposed by the legal effect of the contract.¹¹ Thus an agreement by A to lease a room in a building which A is erecting, when it is completed, impliedly binds A to complete it and hence is a consideration.¹²

If A offers to sell certain property to B and promises to give B a certain time in which to accept, the transaction up to this point is clearly an offer without acceptance.¹ Accordingly if there is no further consideration than appears from such statement of the case A's promise to leave the offer open for a certain time is unenforceable and he may revoke his offer at any time,² and the death of the offeree³ revokes the offer. So if there was once a consideration for the option, it is no consideration for an extension thereof.⁴ For these reasons it is often said that an option has no consideration;⁵ but this means only that it usually has no consideration, not that it cannot have one. If B confers some legal right upon A or forbears some legal right of his own, as waiving a pre-existing right of action,⁶ or where A receives money for the option,⁷ or if A's promise is a part of transaction in which value passes on each side, as where an option to sell is part of a lease for value,⁸ the option has a consideration and is enforceable, even by specific performance.⁹ If the option is accepted before it is revoked a contract binding on both parties is created thereby, as it is in the nature of a continuing offer.¹⁰

A had a right to cancel a contract of employment on sixty days' notice for "good cause," the expression, for "good cause," was held so indefinite that A could end the contract at will. A's promise was therefore no consideration.³ If, however, A must give notice for a substantial period of time before ending his liability under the contract, and such liability is to last until the end of time for which the notice is given, A's promise is a consideration. Thus if A has a right to end the contract at the end of any year,⁴ or on ten days' notice,⁵ or on two weeks' notice,⁶ A's promise is a consideration. So a contract by which A is to drill a well for B at so much per foot, according to depth, A to drill until water is struck or B orders drilling stopped, is supported by consideration.⁷ In other cases a contract which one party may terminate at his option is held to constitute a valuable consideration for the promise of the adversary party.⁸ Thus a contract where A agrees to give B permanent employment, subject to the right to remove B for cause, is a consideration for B's agreement to release a claim for damages.⁹

Cases of this class in which the lack of mutuality is difficult to detect are those in which A and B agree upon the terms on which A is to furnish services or property to B, but leave it to B to decide how much, if any, of such services or property he will accept and pay for. Thus an agreement by a railroad company to carry, at certain fixed rates, whatever goods of certain kinds the promisee should ship,¹ as a promise by a railit is withdrawn, and thus making a contract as to such order,¹⁰ but which may be withdrawn at any time before such acceptance. It thus stands on the same footing as an option.¹¹ Thus where A gives B his note for services which B does not agree to perform, performance constitutes a consideration.¹² Where A was to have half the oil which might be located on B's land by A's drilling, but A was not bound to drill, his drilling in pursuance of B's promise is a consideration, making a contract which equity will enforce specifically.¹³ So a promise to pay a certain sum of money to a railroad when its road is completed to a certain place is enforceable when the road is so completed.¹⁴

In some jurisdictions, however, such an agreement has been regarded not as an offer, but merely as an expression of willingness to negotiate.¹⁵ Where such theory obtains, sending in an order for goods at the specified rates is not an acceptance of a prior offer, but is itself an offer which may be rejected.¹⁶

If there is an independent consideration for A's promise to furnish goods or services at a certain fixed price,¹⁷ or if A's promise is under seal,¹⁸ he cannot revoke such promise. So a promise by A to drive all the logs that B might buy in a certain river is valid where B, though he does not agree to buy any logs releases a claim against A.¹⁹ In such cases acceptance of the irrevocable offer makes a contract, even if the offerer has attempted to revoke his offer.²⁰

If the contract is that A is to furnish all the goods that B needs, B impliedly or expressly agreeing to take from A all that he needs, the case is somewhat different from those just discussed. Some authorities hold that even this promise is not mutual, since B may not need any goods, and is not bound to order any unless he needs them.¹ Others hold that B's promise to buy of A only, is a consideration for A's promise to furnish goods, and that the obligation is mutual.² Where A agreed to furnish B all the ice B needed for five years, B to take such amount, B cannot end contract by selling his business.³ So a contract to deliver to a corporation all the milk produced by A, amounting to twenty gallons or more per-day, for a year, for which the corporation agrees to pay a fixed price, is binding and not void either as indefinite or as lacking in mutuality.⁴

Where by statute option contracts are made illegal in order to suppress gambling, such a contract is not an option.⁵

A contract otherwise binding does not lack mutuality because the thing sold is to satisfy a test by the purchaser to determine if it is suitable for his purpose,¹ as where A bought bonds of B, B to furnish a certified transcript of the proceedings authorizing the issuing of such bonds to the satisfaction of A's attorney.² Such contracts are considered under the subject of Performance.³

So where a limited partnership can incur a debt exceeding five hundred dollars only by a written contract signed by two managers, an oral contract by such a partnership exceeding such sum is no consideration.¹⁹ So if a promise is unenforceable because it is ultra vires of the corporation promising²⁰ it is not a consideration. So a promise made by a married woman where such promises are void, is no consideration.²¹ So according to some courts a contract consisting of executory promises, in which the agent of one party has exceeded his authority, is not binding on the principal and therefore is no consideration for the promise of the adversary party. According to this view, therefore, ratification by the principal does not make the contract binding on the adversary party unless he acquiesces therein after such ratification.²² Performance of a promise which is

Mere performance of an existing contract or a part thereof is of itself no consideration for a new promise to the party performing.¹ Thus rendering services as letter carrier under contract with the government,² or rendering services under a prior contract³ is no consideration. If, without legal justification, one party to a contract breaks it, or threatens to break it, and to induce performance on his part the adversary party promises to pay more than was provided for by the original contract, there is on principle no consideration for such promise, as the party who threatens to break the contract does, when he finally performs it, no more than he was bound in law to do.⁴ Accordingly some courts hold that there is no consideration for such promises.⁵ Thus promises by a surety to induce the principal to pay the note,⁶ a subsequent promise to one who had agreed to take a certain note and mortgage as compensation for party,²⁰ or by a stranger to the contract,²¹ to induce performance. The theory of these last cited cases is that the original contract was in part executory, and that the parties might rescind, the waiver of their mutual rights being a consideration, and that there is then no objection to their making a new contract which may cover the same subject-matter as the original contract. As stated abstractly this is no doubt true. The objection to applying the doctrine to these cases is that it assumes facts which do not exist: for in almost every case the transaction was not a rescission and a subsequent independent new contract, but simply a promise to pay additional compensation for performance of the old contract, often made after rights were fixed by breach. Thus a promise to reduce rent after the tenant had taken possession and refused to pay the rent stipulated,²² a promise to repair, made after a lease was executed,²³ a promise to pay a certain amount extra to induce the adversary party to deliver lumber,²⁴ or ice,²⁵ or a locomotive,²⁶ or plated ware,²⁷ have each been explained as new contracts. An attempt is made by some courts to distinguish these cases, holding that if performance is refused for difficulties in performance unforeseen to the party performing when the contract was made,²⁸ or arising out of innocent misstatement by the party promising,²⁹ performance of such contract constitutes a valuable consideration but otherwise not.³⁰ Whatever the rule between the parties, if both acquiesce in the refusal to perform as a final discharge a third party who becomes security for one party to induce the adversary party to perform cannot allege that no consideration exists.³¹

A creditor has a legal right to the payment of debts due him. follows from an application of this principle that full payment of money due is no consideration for a promise to extend time of payment of another debt,² nor for a promise to release a lien,³ nor for a collateral promise;⁴ nor is part payment of a debt according to the terms of the obligation consideration for a promise to extend the time of payment of the rest of such debt;⁵ nor a consideration for a promise to release the rest,⁶ nor for a promise by a third person,⁷ nor is a promise to pay costs due from one person to another a consideration for a release of other liabilities by the payee.⁸

The rule that payment of a debt due is no consideration is quite technical. While generally enforced by the courts it is not extended beyond its strict terms.⁹ A promise to pay money, not otherwise due and owing is a consideration,¹⁰ as a promise liquidated. If there is a genuine dispute between the parties as to the amount, payment to one of an amount less than that claimed by him is a sufficient consideration for his agreement to release the difference between the amount claimed and the amount paid.²³ A contract entered into between the debtor on one side and more than one of his creditors, whereby the creditors agree to discharge the debtor from liability on his paying a part of the amount due to each is supported by a sufficient consideration, the promise of each creditor to release part of his claim being a consideration for similar promises by the other creditors.²⁴ If a less sum than is due is paid and the transaction amounts to a gift by the creditor to the debtor of the difference the balance of the amount due is discharged.²⁵ Payment of one dollar may discharge a larger debt where the creditor gave the rest of the debt to the debtor.²⁶ The difficulty consists in determining what amounts to a gift. An agreement by a lessor to accept less than the amount of rent reserved in the lease and the acceptance of such less amount may amount to a gift; and it is error to exclude evidence of such transaction from the jury.²⁷ So acceptance of the full amount due from a county treasurer, without interest has been held to be a discharge of a claim for interest.²⁸

Payment of interest already due is no consideration for a promise to extend the time of payment, since the creditor is already entitled thereto.¹ A promise by the debtor to pay interest at the rate already fixed for such time as the debt should remain unpaid, the debtor having the privilege of paying it whenever he can, and discharging his liability by paying the principal with interest down to the date of payment is no consideration for a promise to extend the time of payment.² So a promise to pay interest on an interest bearing account until paid is no consideration.³ If, however, the extension is for a fixed time and the debtor binds himself to pay interest for the whole of such period, even at the rate already fixed, a consideration exists. The debtor has given up his right to discharge his liability by paying the principal with interest down to the date of payment; a right not always of practical value to debtors but recognized by the law.⁴ So a promise to delay enforcing a debt

"In case of a debt which bears interest either by convention or by operation of law, when an extension for a definite period is agreed upon by the parties thereto, the contract is that the creditor will forbear suit during the time of the extension, and the debtor foregoes his right to pay the debt before the end of that time. The latter secures the benefit of the forbearance, the former secures an interest-bearing investment for a definite period until the debtor's death in consideration of being "well paid," has been held to be upon consideration.⁵ In some states, however, no consideration is recognized in extensions of interest-bearing debts for a fixed time.⁶ In states which hold that an extension for a certain time at the same rate of interest lacks consideration, it follows that an extension for a certain time at a lower rate of interest lacks consideration.⁷

A change in the rate or time of paying interest which gives the creditor some legal right not before possessed by him is a consideration for a promise to extend the time of payment. Thus a promise to pay a higher rate of interest than called for by the original contract,⁸ even if lower than that agreed upon for a prior extension, provided it is higher than that fixed by the contract,⁹ a promise to pay interest semi-annually instead of time, one gives up his right to sue for a period in consideration of a promise to pay interest during the whole of the time; the former secures an interest-bearing investment for a definite period of time, one gives up his right to sue for a period in consideration of a promise to pay interest during the whole of the time; the other relinquishes his right to pay during the same period in consideration of a promise of forbearance. To the question why this is not a contract, we think no satisfactory answer can be given."

of annually as provided for by the contract,¹⁰ giving an interest bearing note in payment of interest due on a prior note;¹¹ payment of interest in advance;¹² or before it is due;¹³ are all valuable considerations. An agreement to reduce the rate of interest on an overdue debt, to be paid on demand is valid,¹⁴ since the right forborne is the right to pay the debt with interest under the old contract to the date of payment.

Whether payment of usurious interest or a promise to pay usurious interest is a consideration for a promise to extend the time for the payment of a debt is a question upon which there is a general harmony of principle and diversity of result. The latter grows out of the diversity of statutes forbidding usury, and the corresponding difference in legal effect of usury under the different statutes. The same state often illustrates the variance in effect caused by change of statute. Thus in Indiana under the act of 1845 payment of usury was a valuable consideration.¹ Under a subsequent statute imposing a fine for the payment of usury and providing that it could be recovered by the debtor, payment of usury was held to be no consideration.² Under a still later statute allowing recoupment for payment of usury, such payment was held to be a consideration.³

Under most statutes the actual payment of usury,⁴ as where it is paid in advance,⁵ is a consideration. This rule is applied even if the party making such payment may recoup,⁶ since "the right to plead usury is the personal privilege of the debtor."⁷ If, however, the statute makes payment of usurious interest apply on the principal, payment is no consideration.⁸ Payment of usurious interest according to the terms of the original contract is held not to be a consideration for an agreement to extend time of payment.⁹ A promise to pay usury stands on a different footing. In most jurisdictions such contract is unenforceable and is no consideration.¹⁰ A promise to extend payment on such consideration would therefore not re-

The right of rescission and recoupment is personal to the debtor, his heirs, representatives or sureties. The creditor who has received the usury has no right to restore it or credit it on the debt and thereby release himself from his engagement to give time, and especially after the stipulated time has gone by, on the ground that his agreement was without sufficient consideration." lease a surety.¹¹ A promise to pay usurious interest is most clearly not a consideration when repudiated by the debtor.¹² If under the statute such a promise has any validity, it is a valuable consideration. Thus, when the statute made usury a forfeiture of all interest, a usurious promise was no consideration,¹³ but a change of statute making usury a forfeiture only of the excess above the legal rate makes a usurious promise a consideration.¹⁴ Some jurisdictions, however, invoke the theory that usury is a defense personal to the debtor, and hold that the creditor cannot take advantage of the usury,¹⁵ and that accordingly a contract to extend the time of payment in consideration of a promise to pay usury releases a surety.¹⁶ If the usurious contract has any validity, as where the statute avoids the contract only to the extent of the excess above the legal rate,¹⁷ such promise is a valuable consideration.

If two or more persons are jointly liable on a debt, a release of one of them by the obligee is a waiver of a legal right. Since the obligee could, if necessary or convenient, enforce payment of the entire amount out of the property of any one of them, a payment by any one debtor of part of the debt is only doing part of what he is legally bound to do, and is no consideration for a contract to release him from further liability.¹ On the same principle a promise by one partner already liable on a partnership debt to discharge such debt is no consideration for an agreement to release the other partner.² So a promise by one holding joint and several obligations to enforce them as several obligations for the share of each obligor,³ a promise by the holder of a partnership note to release one partner therefrom,⁴ or a promise to release a surety,⁵ are all without consideration. Even if the liability is not technically joint, but the creditor has a right to hold either of two or more parties his promise to discharge one of them is without consideration.⁶ Conversely an assumption of joint liability by one not originally liable is unenforceable unless supported by a valuable consideration. Thus where A is indebted to B, C's subsequent promise to become surety for A is unenforceable unless some new consideration intervenes.⁷ So a promise by a subsequent accommodation indorser of a note to a prior accommodation indorser to pay one-half of the note,⁸ has no consideration.

tion of such contract is supported by a sufficient consideration in the mutual waiver of the rights arising under the old contract.¹ Even if the contract is broken, if there are mutual liabilities subsisting between the parties,² or if the party who has broken the contract undertakes other and further obligations than those imposed by the original contract in return for a waiver of liabilities under the broken contract,³ or releases the adversary party from some independent liability,⁴ there is a sufficient consideration for such modification. If A refuses to perform because of breach by B, a new promise by B or a third person to induce A to perform has consideration;⁵ and so where there is a bona fide dispute pending, compromise thereof is consideration for a new promise.⁶ Thus where A had delayed performance so that B was discharged from his obligation to perform by a certain time, a promise by A to pay extra compensation if B will perform in the time specified has sufficient consideration.⁷ So where a contractor abandons the work leaving the sub-contractor unpaid, a promise by the owner to pay the sub-contractor for completing his contract rests on consideration.⁸

Another form of stating this rule is that the parties may always rescind a contract executory on both sides and make a new contract.⁹ Thus where A had leased land to B, B to pay a certain number of bushels per acre, and the crop is nearly ruined by storms, they may agree that B shall replant and that A will take as rent one half the crop.¹⁰

If the new promise is to do something further than the promisor had already agreed to do, such promise is a consideration for a reciprocal promise. Thus where A was bound not to allow others to use his name in business a further promise not to engage in business himself is a consideration;¹ and so when a surety consents to an extension of time.² Where no time is fixed for the continuance of the contract and it is held revocable at will,³ a promise of additional compensation for further performance is upon consideration.⁴ A substantial change in the form of a pre-existing liability is a consideration, such as a novation,⁵ the exchange of an absolute unliquidated liability

§319. Past consideration.

A past consideration, so-called, is said to be no consideration.¹ This proposition means that if a right has been received or forborne, under circumstances that either never created any legal liability, or if there was a legal liability, have amounted to a discharge, such right or forbearance cannot be a consideration for a promise made after the act or forbearance, and after the liability, if there ever was any, has been discharged.²

If, however, property was advanced,⁴⁷ or services were rendered under such circumstances as to create a legal liability against the promisor,⁴⁸ which is often expressed by saying if the property was advanced the services were rendered at his previous request,⁴⁹ or if they create a liability which is voidable,⁵⁰ they constitute a consideration for a subsequent express promise to pay for them. If money was loaned in reliance on debtor's promise to furnish additional security, such additional security is supported by a valuable consideration and is not merely on past consideration.⁵¹ So if an oral agreement to guaranty a debt is made when it is incurred, a subsequent written guaranty based on such promise is valid.⁵² Thus where A had agreed to give his personal draft on B to C to take up B's debt to C and in reliance upon such contract C advances money to B and A gives such draft which is not paid by B, A's liability on such draft is supported by sufficient consideration.⁵³

Some authorities even hold that past services not rendered at the promisor's request are a consideration for a subsequent promise,⁵⁴ or deed.⁵⁵ Still more clearly, if the promisee foregoes a legal right, sufficient consideration exists even if the contract relates in part to past transactions. Thus a waiver by lessee of his right to remove improvements made by him,⁵⁶ or waiver by a contractor of his right to remove windows inserted by him in the wrong house by mistake,⁵⁷ are valuable considerations. Even if the original transaction created a legal liability, still if this liability has been discharged, such prior liability is no consideration. Thus after an insurance policy has been forfeited by non-payment of premiums an agent's promise to accept premiums is without consideration.⁵⁸ So where the principal has paid a note in full, no consideration exists thereon to support a subsequent note given by a guarantor to the holder.⁵⁹ A subscriber to a college, whose liability has never attached by reason of breach of condition as to loca-

It is held in many cases, in what on examination prove to be for the most part obiter that a moral obligation is such consideration as will support a subsequent express promise based thereon.¹ This rule in the form given is an unsafe one. If a legal liability once existed, and to this liability some rule of positive law allows a defense which is a bar to an action on the liability though it does not extinguish the debt, an express promise may be based on such liability as a consideration.² The chief examples of such considerations are debts barred by the statute³ of limitations, or by bankruptcy,⁴ or insolvency,⁵ or debts to which infancy may be pleaded as a defense,⁶ or intoxication,⁷ or insanity.⁸ The breach of a contract unenforceable by reason of the Statute of Frauds is a consideration for a written note given therefor.⁹

So a party who has been released from liability on a written instrument by a material alteration thereof,¹⁰ or by extension of time on valuable consideration,¹¹ may without any new consideration bind himself by a subsequent promise to perform such obligation. So a promise to pay usurious interest, though unenforceable in toto may in some states be a consideration for a subsequent promise to pay lawful interest.¹²

Outside of cases where there was once such legal liability, though voidable, the doctrine of moral obligation is generally repudiated.¹³ Thus an attempted contract made by a married woman when such contract is void, as at Common Law, is no consideration for a promise made by her after the termination

nished by a material man to the contractor was placed in A's house, it would support a promise by A to pay for it.²⁵ So where A was employed as supervising principal by a sectional school board and began work, and the board of education refused to confirm the election and abolished the office, and A was defeated in a mandamus suit to be certified on the roll of teachers, it was held that after an appropriation had been made to pay A for her time, an injunction against paying such appropriation would not lie, as the appropriation was supported by a moral obligation.²⁶ Thus notes given by a father to his adult children as compensation for services rendered by them for him, for which he was not legally liable were held to be supported by sufficient consideration.²⁷ A partner loaned partnership funds which were lost by reason of such loan. It did not appear that he incurred any legal liability by reason thereof. Subsequently he assigned a life insurance policy to the firm to cover such loss. It was held that as against his administrator, his moral obligation to reimburse the firm was a sufficient consideration to support such assignment.²⁸ In other states this

The general rule that the legal right acquired or forborne must be a genuine one to constitute a valuable consideration must be qualified in case of compromises of disputed claims. If a bona fide dispute exists as to the validity of a claim, and the parties compromise such dispute by mutual agreement, such compromise is valid; as the mutual releases of rights which are at least apparent, and are upheld in good faith, form a consideration each for the other.¹ If the claims thus compromised that a claim was "in dispute" is insufficient. The averment should be that the claim was "doubtful."²⁵ If, however, the claim is liquidated, and there is no genuine dispute as to its validity, a tender of a less sum than the amount due in full of the entire amount, is, even if accepted, no consideration for an agreement to release the balance.²⁶ In some few jurisdictions a payment in cash of an amount less than is due is a consideration for a promise to release the balance.²⁷ This rule is in force in some states by statute.²⁸

Especial indulgence is shown to family compromises intended to prevent litigation concerning estates.²⁹ If the claim, the waiver of which is relied upon as a consideration, is so clearly unenforceable that it cannot be entertained in good faith, a compromise based on such waiver lacks consideration.³⁰ Thus a dismissal of a groundless and trumped-up contest of a home-stead entry brought to extort money;³¹ compromise of an alleged claim for the seduction of promisee's fiancée;³² an agreement not to issue execution on an alleged judgment which clearly has no existence;³³ or an unwarranted objection to the use by an-

V. ADEQUACY.

§322. Adequacy of consideration at law.

Persons competent to contract are free to make such terms as they choose. Accordingly if such persons not acting under mistake, fraud and the like, select as a consideration some right or forbearance which the law recognizes, and receive just what they bargain for, the law will not inquire into the wisdom of accepting such a consideration, or the profit or loss arising out of the transaction. This principle is often expressed by the rule that mere inadequacy of consideration does not affect the validity of the contract.¹ Examples of considerations which the law regards as valuable, though practically of no financial value, are a release of a note held against a decedent whose estate is insolvent,² or where the note is barred by limita-

a sale of a mining lease, though soon forfeited because the claim was not worked.¹⁶

§323. Adequacy of consideration whose value is fixed by law.

The chief exception at law to the rule that inadequacy of consideration is immaterial exists where the things contracted for on each side are either money or something fixed by law at a certain value in money.¹ Thus a promise to pay one sum of money in exchange for another is without consideration, except insofar as the money to be repaid equals the original sum plus lawful interest.² Thus a consideration of one dollar is no consideration for a promise to pay over a thousand dollars;³ nor is one cent a consideration for a promise to pay six hundred dollars.⁴ However, a release from a promise to pay coin when at a premium is a consideration for a promise to pay the additional amount in currency.⁵ So a promise to extend payment at a lower rate of interest is held to be without consideration if made before maturity and the interest under the new contract would be less than that due when the promise was made.⁶ The correctness of this decision is doubtful. The creditor may for some reason of his own desire to extend the time of payment; and under such extension the debtor has not the option to pay principal and interest to maturity at maturity and thus discharge his debt.⁷ If a substantial change in the method of paying the debt is made the law will not inquire into questions of adequacy. Thus a contract to pay an annuity of sixty-two dollars and fifty cents quarterly is a consideration for a contract to release four thousand dollars, as it exceeds the legal interest thereon by ten dollars a year.⁸ So a promise to pay fifteen hundred dollars as a conditional subscription for the erection of a church in case ten thousand dollars be raised is supported by a promise to pay the promisor two hundred thirty-seven dollars, already voluntarily paid by him for the erection of a temporary chapel.⁹

So where the law fixes certain fees as compensation for certain work, a contract to do such work for more,¹⁰ or less,¹¹ than his legal fees is invalid. Thus the selection of a notary to protest paper is no consideration for his promise to accept one half his legal fees,¹² and a promise by a county clerk not to charge the fees allowed by law for calling in scrip, made to induce the court to make the order calling in such scrip is without consideration.¹³ A promise to pay a witness more than legal fees for attendance which can be compelled by law lacks consideration.¹⁴ But if the attendance could not be compelled by law, as where the witness comes from another state,¹⁵ or where an expert is retained to prepare the case in advance to be able to testify fully at the trial,¹⁶ a promise to pay more than legal fees is supported by a consideration.¹⁷

Mere inadequacy of consideration is not operative in equity.¹ In connection with other circumstances,² or when so extreme as to suggest fraud,³ it may be an important factor in determining the existence of constructive fraud or undue influence. In this connection it has been treated in a preceding chapter.⁴

CHAPTER XV.

THE SUBJECT MATTER.

§325. Nature of subject-matter.

The subject-matter of a contract is the right concerning which the parties make their agreement.¹ Like consideration, it may consist of either an acquisition of a right on the one side, or the forbearance of a right on the other or both at the same time. In the ordinary use of language there is no practical difference between subject-matter and consideration. What one party gives, forbears or promises may be treated equally well as subject-matter or consideration.² Possibly subject-matter may include the consideration on each side, thus being wider than consideration in that it imports what both parties give, forbear or promise. An action on a contract in the limited sense, excluding quasi-contract, is an action to recover damages for breach of an executory promise, or to obtain equitable relief. In such cases, therefore, quite apart from abstract discussion of the correct use of words, the question arises whether any legal right was acquired by the promisor or was forborne by the promisee to induce such promise. This legal right is the consideration.³ The further question may arise whether the act done or to be done by either party is such that the law will permit the parties to contract concerning it. In this sense the right or forbearance under discussion is spoken of as the subject-matter. Accordingly the topic of consideration is the heading under which, as we have seen,⁴ are grouped questions whether the act or abstinence in question concerns a legal right and is recognized by the law as of value, while under the topic of subject-matter

There are certain acts or abstinences from acting which the courts will not allow to be made the subject of contract, though their acquisition or forbearance would undoubtedly be of financial advantage to one or both parties. These acts or abstinences must be considered from two standpoints; first as to the nature and origin of the rules of law which forbid contracts to be made with reference thereto, and second, as to the effect of such rules on the validity and effect of a contract which the parties attempt to make with reference thereto. Both Common Law and Statute may withdraw the subject from the scope of contract in one of three ways: (1) the contract in question may be forbidden, expressly or impliedly; (2) the act in question may be made a crime; or (3) in some cases the imposition of a penalty may make it impossible at law to contract concerning the subject-matter.⁵ In passing upon the question of the validity of a contract as determined by its subject-matter, it is therefore necessary to determine: (1) whether the contract is (a) valid or (b) invalid; and (2) if invalid whether it is (a) void or (b) illegal. In the wider sense of the term the class of void contracts includes illegal contracts; other contracts void by reason of their subject-matter; and contracts void for other reasons. As used in this chapter, however, the term void contracts includes only such as are unenforceable by reason of their subject-matter but are not illegal. (3) In addition to these topics it is often necessary to consider whether, if the contract is invalid because of its subject-matter any right of action exists by reason of benefits received thereunder. The legality of the contract is determined by the law. On the one hand the frank avowal of an unlawful purpose does not make a contract valid;⁶ or the other, the fact that a lawful contract was believed to be unlawful does not make it invalid.⁷

⁵ These subdivisions of this general topic must be considered in detail. However to avoid unnecessary reduplication of discussion the effect of statute and of Common Law on given subjects, such as gambling contracts or contracts in restraint of trade must be considered together.

§326. Contracts unenforceable by Common Law.

In jurisdictions where Common Law crimes exist a contract to perform an act which would be a crime at Common Law is unenforceable.¹ In addition to contracts to commit crimes there is a large class of contracts said to be void as against public policy.² Contracts are against public policy when they tend to injure the state or the public.³ "Public policy is that principle of law which holds that no subject or citizen can lawfully do that which has a tendency to be injurious to the public or against the public good."⁴ The power to refuse to enforce a contract as against public policy is one of limits not clearly defined,⁵ and the courts prefer in cases not settled by recognized precedents,⁶ to use such power only in clear cases.⁷

The defense of public policy is so often interposed as a last resort⁸ that the courts have become somewhat suspicious of it. The doctrine has been unsuccessfully invoked in actions on the following contracts: A contract by A to locate a business in a given town X, which he otherwise would have located in the town of Y;⁹ a contract by an elevated railroad company in consideration of being allowed a stay of proceedings pending an appeal not to take advantage of the fact that the other party would sell his interest in the realty in dispute;¹⁰ a contract by a sleeping-car company to reserve a berth in a given car for a given trip;¹¹ a bond for faithful discharge of duties by the cashier of a branch bank;¹² a sale of one's right to occupy Indian lands with the consent of the Indians;¹³ and a division of a mining claim between claimants in order to compromise litigation.¹⁴

There may be said to be a strong tendency at modern law to restrict the operation of public policy as avoiding contracts, to cases included under recognized legal principles;¹⁵ or under statutes. Still contracts clearly injurious to the public interest are held invalid, however novel. Thus where a laborer and his wife, people of no medical training and having several small children, made a contract with a woman in an advanced stage of leprosy to care for her and provide her with board, such contract was held contrary to public policy.¹⁶

If the law-making power speaks on a given subject concerning which it has power under the Constitution to legislate, no further inquiry into public policy on that subject should be made than to determine what the statute provides.¹⁷ Any classification of contracts, invalid as opposed to public policy, is therefore, merely for convenience in discussion. It is impossible to lay down in advance an exhaustive classification, which will include all possible cases. Further, many of the classes of cases hereinafter given are greatly modified by statute, so that they cannot literally be classed as contracts invalid by the Common Law. They are discussed in that connection, however, since they owe their original invalidity to the Common Law.

may protect public safety, health and morals.² If in the exercise of this power the legislature prohibits certain classes of contracts or declares them void, such contracts are of course void and unenforceable.³ The intention of the legislature to withdraw the given subject-matter from the scope of contract may be expressed in several different ways. (1) The act in question may be made criminal. Contracts to perform such acts will be unenforceable.⁴

Contracts to perform such acts will be unenforceable.¹ Thus a statute forbidding a common carrier to issue bills of lading in advance of the receipt of the goods makes void a contract whereby in consideration of indemnity the common carrier undertakes so to do.² So a contract for selling tickets through brokers at less than the established rate in violation of the Interstate Commerce Law;³ a contract requiring the chairman of a political committee to disburse money, contrary to statute;⁴ a public contract requiring money to be paid over to a public agent who is not empowered to receive it;⁵ a contract to employ a minor in an employment at which minors are forbidden to work,⁶ to work in excess of the statutory number of hours per day;⁷ to sell bonds below par, contrary to statute;⁸ to acquire public lands in a manner forbidden by statute;⁹ or taking a note in payment of a tax, which the law requires to be paid in cash,¹⁰ are all invalid. So the Federal Bankruptcy Statute makes void a contract of assignment for the benefit of creditors.¹¹ So under statutes forbidding discrimination in rates for life insurance between persons of the same class a contract of insurance by the terms of which the insured is to be a member of an advisory board and as such is to have special advantages is invalid.¹² But such a statute does not prevent issuing a policy for one year with the privilege of taking a policy to run for life at the end of the year.¹³ So a contract to rebuild a dam is invalid where, contrary to statute, the specifications therefor have not been approved by the state board of civil engineers.¹⁴ So a clause in an insurance policy in type smaller than that provided by statute, limiting the liability of the insurer, is void.¹⁵ A statute forbidding a railroad company to sell its road or any part thereof does not forbid a lease, with a clause for a sale as soon as good title can be made.¹⁶ A contract which violates a city ordinance, but contains a clause permitting changes in such illegal specification necessary to make it legal is not illegal.¹⁷ On the other hand, a statute

Contracts to perform acts which are made crimes are held unenforceable because it must ordinarily be the intention of the legislature not to permit an action against one for not doing what would make him liable to criminal punishment. This rule is therefore subject to this qualification: if the act specified is made a crime in order to protect the adversary party to the contract, the statute will be applied with that purpose in view, and the contract will not be held void to the prejudice of the party to be protected.¹ The same principle applies where the act contracted for is forbidden by law. The intention of the legislature in forbidding such act must be considered in determining whether a contract to do such act is unenforceable. Thus where the director of a bank borrowed an excessive amount, the bank was allowed to recover, as the contract was for its protection.² So where one debtor borrowed more than one-tenth of the paid-in capital of a bank, contrary to statute, he was nevertheless held liable for such debt.³ If a national bank takes a mortgage on realty in violation of the National Banking Act, only the United States can interpose objection; and if it does not see fit to punish the bank therefor, the mortgagor cannot avoid his liability on the ground of the illegality of the transaction.⁴ So an executed contract of sale made with an individual who unlawfully uses the addition "& Co." though he has no partner is valid.⁵ So under a statute forbidding an attorney to make a contract to divide his fee with the person who procures the business for him, a contract whereby a broker with the knowledge of his customers places in the hands of an attorney, on a contingent fee, their claims for excessive duties, the broker to have a part of the attorney's fee, may be enforced by the broker after the attorney has collected his fee, the statute applying only to the lawyer and not to the layman.⁶ A contract is unenforceable which violates the spirit and intent of a statute, though not the express words thereof.⁷ Thus contracts to allow bondholders to vote at stockholders' meetings,⁸ or to pay money for organizing a corporation in evasion of the statutes

(3) A contract to do an act, upon the doing of which the law imposes a penalty, is generally unenforceable.¹ Thus under a statute imposing a penalty on an agent's granting a rebate of a premium to one effecting insurance an agent cannot recover on a note given for the amount of the premium less the rebate.² The repeal of the statute imposing the penalty does not make prior contracts valid.³

§332. Legislative intent in imposing penalty controls.

This rule is not, however an arbitrary one, but rests solely on the reason that the penalty is imposed to prevent the performance of the act in question. The validity of the contract depends on the intention of the legislature as determined from the entire act. If the object of the statute is to prevent the performance of the act specified,¹ or to protect the general public,² a contract in violation of the statute is invalid. There are, however, cases in which a penalty does not invalidate the contract whereby it is incurred. The question is entirely one of legislative intent.³ (a) A statute solely for the benefit of revenue, which imposes penalties or fines for its violation, does not of itself make void contracts entered into in violation thereof,⁴ as in case of sale by an unlicensed peddler.⁵ Such construction has been placed on the United States revenue laws, with reference to license fees for the sale of liquor,⁶ or to license fees for a real estate broker,⁷ and recovery has been allowed on contracts violating such statutes.⁸

(b) If the penalty is imposed for the protection of one party to the contract, the statute must not be so construed as to make such contract void so as to injure the interests of such party. Thus a statute which imposes a penalty on effecting insurance in a foreign company until it has complied with the statutes for admission to do business in the state is intended for the benefit of the policy-holders and must not be construed so as to make their contracts void.⁹ Statutes requiring foreign corporations to comply with certain formalities in order to obtain certificates authorizing them to do business in that state, and imposing a penalty or making it a misdemeanor to do business without such permission, are held in some jurisdictions to make void contracts entered into by such corporations before obtaining such certificate.¹⁰ Such corporation cannot sue on a bond to secure it against the defalcation of its manager,¹¹ nor can an insurance company enforce notes given to it by its agents for uncollected premiums,¹² nor can it collect from its agent premiums collected by him,¹³ nor can it, if a mutual insurance company, collect assessments from resident members.¹⁴ In other jurisdictions, such statutes are held to be designed to protect residents of the state, and hence such contracts are not void to their prejudice;¹⁵ and it is even held that the corporation may enforce such contracts.¹⁶ A statute imposing a penalty on the sale of lots on an unrecorded plot is intended primarily for the benefit of the vendee, to protect his title. sale and conveyance is therefore not illegal or void.¹⁷ Statutes requiring a note given for a patent right to have the words "given for a patent right" on its face, are usually held constitutional.¹⁸ A statute providing that a note given to an itinerant vendor for goods sold by him shall have the words "peddler's note" upon its face is valid and does not affect the rights of the owner of a patent.¹⁹ Where such statutes impose a penalty for such omission, or make it a misdemeanor, some courts treat a note or contract from which such provision is omitted as illegal,²⁰ while others treat such contracts as valid.²¹ Where the statute expressly makes such note void, it is held that the purpose is to prevent the vendee from being cut off from setting up his equities by a transfer to a bona fide holder. certain territory unless it specifically includes such sales.²⁴ A statute providing a method of solemnizing a marriage, and imposing a penalty in case of marriage not complying with such formalities, does not make such marriage void.²⁵ To have this effect the statute must provide that a marriage not in statutory form is void.

(c) If the statute which forbids the act and imposes the penalties discloses legislative intent to provide completely for its violation, the courts do not add an additional penalty which will affect other persons, often innocent, by making contracts void.²⁶ A statute imposing a fine on persons doing business on Sunday must be read in connection with a prior statute providing on what terms one may avoid a Sunday contract, and does not make such contracts void irrespective of compliance with such terms.²⁷

(4) If a statute imposes a license fee on certain occupations, or on the sale of certain articles, for the benefit of the general public, to protect them from imposition, a contract in violation of such statute is generally held to be unenforceable.¹ Thus a contract whereby A agrees to allow B to do business under A's license is invalid.² So a contract involving the assignment of a license to sell liquor is invalid.³ Contracts in violation of such statutes are clearly invalid if the licensing statute imposes attorney, whereby the latter is to secure clients and hunt up testimony for the former in consideration of a share in the fees, has been held contrary to public policy.¹⁷ As these statutes are to protect the public and not the physician, or other person who is required to procure a license, they must be enforced to that end. Such a physician may be liable for malpractice.¹⁸ Where an institution for the cure of the drug habit agrees to cure A or return to B the consideration paid by him for A, B was allowed to recover on failure to cure A, though neither the institution nor its employees had a license to practice medicine.¹⁹

insurance policy covering goods used in such business.²⁷ Recovery can be had if the contract is outside the unlicensed business.²⁸ Under this statute an unlicensed bank can recover upon a bill of lading assigned to it.²⁹ No recovery can be had on a contract for the use of an unlicensed stallion, the owner being by statute liable to indictment and fine for not procuring the license;³⁰ so where the statute requiring the name of the stallion to be filed with the register of the county where the stallion is owned or kept, has not been complied with.³¹

However, some courts are unwilling to declare executed contracts of sale void because vendor had not obtained a license, if the statute does not expressly declare them void.³² Thus under a statute making it a misdemeanor to loan money without first obtaining a license to carry on such business, it has been held that recovery may be had upon a loan made by an unlicensed agent.³³ This result is reached in some cases by a very strict construction of the statute. A statute imposing a penalty on "carrying to sell or exposing for sale" without a license was held not to avoid the sale itself.³⁴ The repeal of the act requiring a license does not make prior sales valid,³⁵ even if the ordinance imposing the license is repealed after the services stamped,⁵ are generally held to make sales in violation of such statutes void, so that the vendor cannot recover.⁶

It has been stated rather loosely that a contract to violate the law of a foreign country is valid,¹ at least when such law is a revenue law.² An analysis of the cases on which this alleged rule rests discloses that for the most part they do not involve the validity of a contract between A and B whereby A is required to violate the laws of a foreign state; but merely discuss whether a sale by B to A, otherwise valid, is invalid because A intends to use the property thus sold to him in violating the law of a foreign state.³ Thus, A sold B an engine and boiler, taking back a mortgage for the purchase price. By agreement steam was gotten up in the boiler so that B could import them into another country as second-hand machinery at a reduced duty, which B succeeded in doing. Such mortgage was held valid.⁴ The modern rule is that a contract which tends to the violation of a foreign law is invalid.⁵ Thus a contract whereby A and B agreed to enlist men in Canada for the United States army during the Civil War was held invalid and A was not allowed to recover money advanced to B thereunder.⁶ This rule is so often assumed that the discussion in any particular case turns on the question whether the particular contract tends to a violation of foreign law.⁷ The rule that a contract which tends to violate the law of a foreign state is invalid must not be confused with the doctrine that the validity of a contract is controlled by the law of the place of performance.⁸ Thus a contract may be invalid as in violation of the law of another state, and yet not subject to a statute of such other state allowing a party who has paid money under such contract to recover the same.⁹

§336. Contract for illegal sale of intoxicating liquor in foreign state.

Questions as to violation of foreign law are often presented where A has sold intoxicating liquor to B in a state where such sale is legal, and B means to resell it in a state where such sale is illegal. The rules which determine the validity of the sale by A to B are the same as those governing other contracts collateral to a crime of small magnitude. If A does not know and has no reasonable ground for knowing of B's illegal intent, A can enforce the contract of sale.¹ Mere knowledge by vendor of vendee's unlawful intent seems enough to make the original sale unlawful in some jurisdictions.² Statutes may make such sale illegal irrespective of vendor's knowledge of vendee's intent.³ Apart from statute even if the vendor has some reason to believe that the vendee means to make an unlawful use of the goods sold he can recover if he does not know of such intention in fact.⁴ To go to the other extreme, if the vendor by his contract with the vendee contemplates and aids in a violation of the laws of another state, such contract is invalid.⁵ Thus the contract of sale is invalid if the vendor by means of false invoices,⁶ false marking,⁷ deceptive packing,⁸ advice as to method of avoiding seizure,⁹ or assistance in evading a penalty,¹⁰ and the like, aids in the illegal intent. It has, however, been held that packing bottles of liquor in plain boxes¹¹ or shipping it in "fake barrels"¹² does not of itself make the sale illegal unless in pursuance of an intent to aid the vendee in violation of the law. Where the dividing point is to be inserted between these extremes is a question on which the courts are not harmonious. The weight of authority is that vendor's knowledge of vendee's intent to resell unlawfully does not of itself make the original sale illegal.¹³ Some cases hold that while the vendor's mere knowledge of the unlawful intent of the vendee does not make the contract of sale invalid,¹⁴ yet if the vendor intends to aid the vendee in the commission of the unlawful act, the contract of sale is invalid, even if the vendor makes the sale primarily for gain and only incidentally to aid the unlawful purpose.¹⁵ It thus appears that a contract to violate foreign law stands on the same footing as a contract to violate domestic law,¹⁶ and that there is the same conflict of authority on the question when a collateral contract is so closely connected with the illegal purpose as to be itself illegal. By statute in some states a contract for the sale of intoxicating liquors in violation of the law governing the sale thereof is invalid.¹⁷

The distinction between illegal and void contracts will be reserved until after a discussion of the types of illegal and void contracts.¹ The void contracts will be first considered,² and then the illegal,³ as far as the two classes can be distinguished from each other. As will be seen⁴ from a comparison of the views of different states, contracts held to be merely void in some jurisdictions are held in others to be illegal. Further, some contracts such as usury are anomalous since the statute which forbids them provides specifically for the effect of such contracts; and such provisions as to effect are different from those which the common law would provide in case of either illegal or void contracts. The effect of illegal and void contracts and the distinction between them,⁵ the effect of performance,⁶ and the validity of contracts which are collateral to illegal and void transactions,⁷ will finally be considered.

this country. Not only should it be decided in the same way in which we should expect a Maine court to decide upon a Maine contract presenting a similar question, but it should be decided as we think that a Maine court ought to decide this very case if the action were brought there. . . . Of course it would be possible for an independent state to enforce all contracts made and to be performed within its territory, without regard to how much they might contravene the policy of its neighbor's laws. But in fact no state pursues such a course of barbarous isolation. As a general proposition it is admitted that an agreement to break the laws of a foreign country would be invalid." Graves v. Johnson, 156 Mass. 211; 32 Am. St. Rep. 446; 15 L. R. A. 834; 30 N. E. 818.

CHAPTER XVI.

VOID CONTRACTS—CHAMPERTY, MAINTENANCE AND BARRATRY.

§338. Original common-law theory of champerty.

The Common Law had an intense aversion to interference by one person in the litigation of another not in a near relation. This tendency manifested itself in many different ways. It forbade assignment of contract rights except those governed by the law merchant.¹ It forbade the conveyance of land held adversely; a principle which is still in effect in many jurisdictions.² With this general tendency firmly rooted in the law, there was no question about the general principle that contracts whereby a stranger to litigation took any part therein were contrary to public policy. The various forms of these objectionable contracts were grouped under maintenance, champerty and barratry. The reasons underlying this rule are stated elsewhere.³ They belong to an order of things that has long since passed away. There is apparently small danger that great men may buy up pretended claims and sue upon them, using their personal influence to secure their success. Accordingly the contracts which fall within this principle are far narrower in extent than at the original Common Law. The principle is for the most part dwindling and shrinking. The difficulty of stating it at Modern Law, and the lack of uniformity among modern cases are due to two causes: the uncertainty as to how far the Common Law precedents should be followed in a changed order of things; and, in modifying the Common Law rules to suit modern ideas of policy, the lack of agreement as to what a sound modern policy is.

“Maintenance is . . . an officious intermeddling in a suit that in no way belongs to one, by maintaining or assisting either party with money or otherwise to prosecute or defend it.”¹ It was a crime at Common Law.

¹ Black. Com. Bk. IV. 134: “Maintenance, Manutentia is derived of the verbe Manutenere, and signifieth in Law, a taking in hand, bearing up or upholding of quarrels and sides, to the disturbance or hindrance of Common right, Culpa est rei se immiscere ad se non pertinenti; and it is twofold, One in the Countrey, and another in the Court. For quarrels and sides in Court, the Statutes have inflicted grievous punishments. But this kincke of maintenance of quarrels and sides in the country, is punishable only at the suit of the King, as it hath beene resolved. And this Maintenance is called Manutenentia, or Manutentio ruralis, for example, as to take possessions, or to keepe possessi ns, whereof Littleton here speaketh, or the like. The other is called Curialis, because it is done

pendente placito, in the Courts of Justice; and this was an offense at the Common Law, and is threefold. First, to maintaine to have part of the Land, or anything out of the Land, or part of the Debt, or other thing in plea or suit; and this is called Cambipartia, Champertie. The second is, when one maintaineth the one side, without having any part of the thing in Plea, or suit; and this Maintenance is twofold, general maintenance and special maintenance; whereof you shall reade at large in our Bookes, which were too long here to be inserted. The third is when one laboureth the Jury, if it be but to appeare, or if he instruct them, or put them in fear, or the like, he is a maintainer, and he is in law called an Embraceor, and an action of Maintenance lieth against him; and if he Considered in its relation to contracts, some courts still refuse to enforce a contract in performing which one party must be guilty of maintenance.² Thus a contract by one not an attorney and not a relation of certain heirs, to get them to sue to contest a will and to aid them therein, and to receive for his services "a sum equal to" a given fraction of what should be recovered, was held void.³ Even under such statute one may sue to protect his own interest and so may aid in a suit necessarily brought in the name of another. Thus a vendor of realty who has a lien for his purchase money may agree with his vendee to aid in a suit to recover the value of the timber taken from such land by trespassers, one-half of such recovery to be paid to vendor and credited as part of the purchase price.⁴

"A man may, however, maintain the suit of his near kinsman, servant or poor neighbor out of charity and compassion, with impunity."⁵ A parent may supply his daughter with funds to sue, as for breach of promise and seduction.⁶ So it is not maintenance for a wife to aid her husband.⁷

Such aid must, however, not be given as a speculation.⁸ In other states it is held that maintenance at Common Law does take money, a decies tantum may be brought against him. And whether the jury passe for his side or no, or whether the Jurie give any verdict at all, yet shall he be punished as a maintainer or Embraceor, either at the suit of the King or partie." Co. Litt. 368b. See Hovey v. Hobson, 51 Me. 62.

not exist.⁹ In such states lending money to carry on litigation in consideration of a share in the recovery;¹⁰ or furnishing documentary evidence and agreeing to pay expenses of litigation for a contingent fee, the claim being a valid one,¹¹ do not amount to maintenance.

"Champerty, campi-partitio, is a species of maintenance and punished in the same manner; being a bargain with a plaintiff or defendant campum partire, to divide the land or other matter sued for between them if they prevail at law; whereupon the champertor is to carry on the parties' suit at his own expense."¹² In some states champerty at Common Law is not recognized;¹³ in others, it is.¹⁴ Champerty as appearing in the form of an assignment of a chose in action is discussed subsequently.¹⁵

ous.³ The position taken in some states is that a contract giving the attorney a part of the recovery is valid,⁴ unless there is an additional provision that the client shall not be liable in case there is no recovery.⁵ A contract between a litigant and one not an attorney for a contingent recompense in consideration of aid in litigation is valid in some states, if not resorted to as a means of stirring up litigation.⁶ Such contracts are held invalid in other states, however,⁷ and seem less favored than contracts between attorney and client for contingent fees. Thus a contract whereby one injured in a railroad accident employed a doctor to explain his injuries to the company and agreed to pay him in proportion to the amount paid on such claim by the company is void.⁸ At Common Law the king could make or receive assignments of contract rights. The ordinary rules of champerty did not apply to him. At

Modern Law this some general principle applies to contracts made by the state. Whatever the validity of a contract to pay contingent fees made by a natural person, a contract made by a state, to pay a contingent to its own agent for claims collected by him is valid.⁹ Thus a contract by a public corporation employing a person to discover property not listed for taxation and agreeing to pay him one per cent. of collections made by reason of his services is valid.¹⁰

If the attorney in his contract with his client not only agrees to take a contingent fee but also agrees to pay the costs himself or to indemnify his client against them if unsuccessful, such contract is generally held to be champertous and void.¹ The fact that in case of failure the attorney is to receive a nominal recompense such as one dollar does not prevent such contract from being champertous.² Some authorities, however, treat such contracts as valid.³ A loan by attorney to client to enable him to pay costs, or an advance of costs by attorney, the client to reimburse him thereafter, does not make the contract champertous.⁴ Thus where A as attorney had rendered services in obtaining a judgment for his client B, it was held a valid contract where B assigned A one half of such judgment for his services, B agreeing to collect the judgment, advance all costs and expenses, and in case of failure A to pay B one half of the costs thus advanced.⁵ The object both of the Common Law rule and the statutes is "to prevent strangers from obtruding themselves into suits and promoting vexatious litigation."⁶ Accordingly a contract to pay the expenses of litigation made by one who has, independent of such contract, an interest in the subject-matter of the litigation is not champertous.⁷ Thus in an action by a taxpayer, for the benefit of himself and other taxpayers, including his attorney a contract by the attorney to protect his client against costs is valid;⁸ and so is a contract whereby creditors agree to bear the costs of an action in their debtor's name to recover property to be subjected to their debts.⁹ If the interest of the attorney is created by the contract whereby he agrees to pay costs, it is champertous.¹⁰ Still assigning half of a judgment recovered, to the attorney, as compensation for services rendered in recovering it and to be rendered in enforcing it, gives him such interest therein that it is not champerty for him to agree to pay one half of the costs.¹¹

If the contract between attorney and client contains a clause forbidding or restricting the client from settling or dismissing the case without the consent of his attorney, the entire contract is champertous and void.¹ Thus a contract whereby A agrees to bring a suit for B at A's cost, A to receive "an amount equal to one-half of whatever sum may be collected," B not to settle the claim without A's consent, and if he does so, B to pay A seventy-five dollars, is invalid.²

§343. Necessity of providing for litigation.

Some courts have laid down the rule that a contract, to be champertous must provide for prosecuting or defending a suit.¹ On this theory contracts for collecting claims from a government, as from the United States,² for a certain part of the amount recovered, have been held not to be champertous.³

Common barratry is "the offense of frequently exciting and stirring up suits and quarrels between his majesty's subjects, either at law or otherwise."¹ A contract whereby A, who has hunted up the claims of a great number of landowners against a railway for failure to fence the right of way, agrees that he will pay the costs of litigating such suits for a part of the recovery, no liability to attach if there is no recovery, is barratrous as well as champertous.² An attorney who knew of A's plan and rendered services in a great number of cases thus obtained by A under A's employment is a party to such unlawful scheme and cannot recover,³ nor can he recover in quantum meruit.⁴ A contract by A, an attorney, to pay B a contingent fee out of fees to be paid by X to A if B will induce X to employ A, has been held valid in some cases,⁵ and invalid in others.⁶

§345. Effect of champertous contract.

A champertous contract cannot be enforced by either of the parties thereto.¹ They are thus clearly void, but whether illegal or not is a question on which the courts are not harmonious. Some courts hold that champertous covenants are not only void, but illegal, and invalidate other covenants in the same contract otherwise unenforceable:² and do not allow an attorney who has rendered services under a champertous contract to recover on a quantum meruit.³ Other courts apparently treating such contracts as merely void, allow recovery on a quantum meruit.⁴

If A has a claim against B, and A makes a champertous contract with his attorney X with reference to such claim, the question is often raised whether B can use such champertous contract as a defense to A's action against him. The weight of authority is that such champertous contract is no defense as long as A remains the real party in interest, as the action does not tend to enforce the champertous contract.¹ In some states

B may have A's action dismissed on showing the existence of the champertous contract.² If, however, the champertous contract between A and X, the attorney, is such that A, though the nominal plaintiff, is not the real party in interest, his interest being assigned to X, B may interpose this as a defense, not properly on account of the champerty, but because the action must be brought by, and in the name of, the real party in interest.³ So if X, the attorney, sues in his own name on A's cause of action which has not been actually assigned to X, B may interpose this fact as a defense as the action is not brought by the real party in interest.⁴

If A has a champertous contract with X whereby A in consideration of X's aiding him in recovering a claim from B, agrees by a champertous contract to give A a part of the proceeds,⁵ and B has knowledge thereof, it has been held that B may ignore such champertous contract and settle with A regardless of X's claim.⁶ A contrary opinion, however, has been entertained.⁷ Where in settling with A, B agrees to pay A's attorney fee, B cannot thereafter object that A had a champertous contract with his attorney.⁸

CHAPTER XVII.

CONTRACTS WAIVING RIGHTS.

§347. Contract renouncing in advance right to invoke redress at law.

The law does not allow parties to make contracts whereby they bargain away in advance the right to resort to the courts for the protection of their rights and the determination of their liabilities.¹ Thus a clause in a contract that a suit thereon may be brought only in the United States Circuit Court,² or only in a certain county in the state,³ or that no action thereon shall be brought in the United States courts or removed to such court,⁴ is invalid. A state may, however, revoke the license of a foreign corporation for exercising its right of removal to the United States courts.⁵ However, a contract executed in Italy between a citizen of Italy and citizens of New York, to be performed, partly in Italy and partly in the United States, and containing a provision that any dispute arising thereunder should be determined only by "the civil authorities of Florence, Italy," was held to be valid as to such provision.⁶ A clause in a Lloyd's policy of insurance that no action should be brought thereon except against the general manager as attorney in fact, and that all the underwriters would abide the result of such action as fixing their individual liabilities, has been held valid.⁷ A contract not to appeal a cause is held to prevent the appellate court from hearing such cause;⁸ but such contract is construed very strictly, and a contract not to appeal does not preclude a writ of error.⁹ Such promise is at any rate invalid without a consideration.¹⁰ Contracts made in advance to waive error have been held valid,¹¹ as a clause in a lease,¹² or in a cognovit note,¹³ waiving error.

§348. Contracts in advance for arbitration of entire subject-matter.

A provision in a contract that the entire subject-matter of disputes thereunder shall be submitted to arbitration cannot contract to the determination of the architect is not valid.⁴

An exception to the general rule in many jurisdictions exists in the case of voluntary beneficial associations. In voluntary unincorporated benevolent associations it is held that contracts whereby the amount and even the existence of any claim of a member against the order is left solely with the tribunals of such order are valid;⁵ and so with the mutual fire insurance companies.⁶

Thus a contract not to contest the validity of a patent,² or to arbitrate questions of alimony and the custody and maintenance of the children,³ are valid. But a contract to arbitrate an existing right of action has some peculiarities which may here be briefly noted. A submission may be revoked before the award is published,⁴ even if the individual opinions of the arbitrators are known,⁵ unless by statute,⁶ or made a rule of court.⁷ So death revokes submission prior to the award,⁸ except where it is made a rule of court.⁹ A written submission cannot be revoked orally.¹⁰ So a submission under seal cannot be revoked orally.¹¹ If supported by a further consideration than the mutual promises to arbitrate it may be irrevocable. Thus where an action had been dismissed, costs paid, and testimony before the arbitrators transcribed, the submission cannot be revoked when the evidence is almost all in.¹² A deposit to secure payment of an award is forfeited by revocation of the submission and may be applied to the costs and expenses incurred by the adversary party.¹³ After the award is §352. Contracts concerning procedure and remedies.

The extent to which parties may go in modifying the course of procedure in civil actions by private contract may be indicated by saying that they can waive merely private rights and can confer jurisdiction of the person; but they cannot confer jurisdiction of the subject-matter nor can they modify rules imposed for the public good or the benefit of the court, nor can they require a court to give remedies other than given by the system of jurisprudence which the court administers.¹ Thus a contract extending the time for filing a bill of exceptions is invalid where the jurisdiction of the court to allow a bill of exceptions as part of the record expires with the time limited by statute;² but if the court has jurisdiction to allow made under the mistaken impression that the issues involved no question of fraud, forgery or perjury.¹²

So the parties may agree that judgment shall be entered,¹³ or reversed.¹⁴ Still such contracts are not always enforced if unfair or unreasonable.¹⁵ In some cases the parties may make a valid stipulation as to the value of the property in litigation.¹⁶

To what extent parties may by provisions in a contract waive defenses to the validity of that contract is a question on which the courts are not in harmony. Thus a covenant that a life insurance policy shall be incontestable from its execution for fraud in the application, is valid in some jurisdictions,¹ and precludes the defense that insured took out the policy under a fraudulent scheme of committing suicide.² A clause that a policy shall become incontestable after a certain specified time is valid,³ and prevents defenses of fraud⁴ and suicide.⁵

Whether such provision precludes the defense that the beneficiary has no insurable interest is a question on which courts differ.⁶

§354. Contract waiving general exemptions in advance.

A covenant in a contract whereby the promisor agrees in advance to waive his rights of exemption in his property generally, is void in most jurisdictions,¹ on the theory that the statute is enacted for the protection of necessitous debtors, and to allow them to contract away their rights in advance would be to defeat the purpose of the statute.² In some cases stress is laid on the fact that the exemption, being for the benefit of the whole of the debtor's family, cannot be waived by the debtor alone.³ Conversely it has been held that if the debtor is unmarried he can waive any exemptions, since only his own interest is thus affected.⁴ But the sounder reasoning leads to the conclusion that the debtor cannot agree in advance to waive his right of exemption even though he has no family to be prejudiced thereby.⁵ There is some authority for holding general waivers of exemptions in advance as binding.⁶

The distinction between the two cases is that in the first the beneficiary caused the insured to effect the insurance under a promise to pay the premiums, thus making wager insurance; see § 383 et seq.

In the second case, the beneficiary had an insurable interest and then assigned the policy to the widow of the insured. Whether the assignment was valid or not, it was not a wager policy.

The debtor may of course waive exemption as to specific property by giving a mortgage or lien thereon in the manner prescribed by law,⁷ or by agreement to make a payment out of a specific fund otherwise exempt.⁸ Such waiver enures solely to the benefit of the mortgagee. Other creditors cannot take advantage of it.⁹ So after judgment he may waive exemptions as to the specific property levied on.¹⁰ Neither of these two last cases fall within the letter or the spirit of the general rule.

§355. Waiver of statutory rights.

Statutes are often passed to protect persons against the effects of certain types of contract. The purpose of such statutes would be defeated if their effect could be avoided by contract; and accordingly it is held that if such is the legislative intent, covenants attempting to avoid the provisions of such statutes are void. Statutes in some states provide that after a certain time an insurance policy cannot be defeated for mere misrepresentation or breach of warranty not amounting to fraud. Such statutes are constitutional.¹ Their provisions cannot be waived by contract and an attempt to do so, directly or indirectly, is void,² as by contracting that the law of another state shall govern the contract.³ So an attempt to evade the statute of fixing the surrender value after a certain number of premiums had been paid is ineffectual.⁴ So the provisions of a statute requiring notice that a premium is due in order to forfeit the policy for non-payment cannot be waived by contract.⁵ So a provision in a contract for lending money on the security of a paid-up policy giving to the insurance company the right to require a surrender of the policy for its cash value in default of payment has been held void.⁶ So under a statute making the value of the property insured, as fixed in the policy final in case of a total loss, a covenant providing for the payment of the actual value only is void.⁷ Thus a contract giving the insurer a right to rebuild, where the statute requires that in total losses the amount named in the policy must be paid to the insured, is invalid.⁸ But if the statute makes the amount fixed by the policy prima facie only, an agreement to fix its value by appraisal is valid.⁹ In states in which statutes limiting the hours for working are valid,¹⁰ the employee cannot waive this provision and a contract entered into in violation thereof is illegal.¹¹ So under statutes providing that wages must be paid in lawful money a contract waiving such right is invalid.¹²

A contract upon valuable consideration, made before a claim is barred, not to plead the statute of limitations to such claim after it shall have become barred, is generally held valid,¹ though probably an action to enforce such promise must be brought within the time fixed by the statute of limitations after such promise of waiver is made,² or within a reasonable time after such promise.³ It has been held that even if lacking in consideration through failure to agree to delay for any definite time such agreement may operate as an estoppel if acted on.⁴ In some jurisdictions, however, such provisions have been held to be invalid.⁵

The warehouse inspector by contract with various growers tried to extend these terms to six months and nine months respectively. The contract was held "void as contrary to public policy."

Provisions are often found in contracts whereby the parties attempt to shorten the period of limitations. A provision that suit must be brought within a given time after the loss, or after notice to the party liable, and the like, are held valid if fair and reasonable. Such provisions in insurance policies,⁶ and bills of lading,⁷ are held valid. Such restrictions are invalid in some jurisdictions.⁸ But such restrictions must be reasonable, even where valid, especially in bills of lading.⁹ A limita-

A limitation of forty days within which suit must be brought and summons served has been held invalid,¹³ since the plaintiff cannot lawfully control the conduct of public officers.

In some jurisdictions statute fixes a time within which it forbids rights of action to be limited by contract.¹⁴ A statute providing in general terms that if a suit commenced within the period of limitations is dismissed other than on its merits, a new suit may be begun within a fixed time thereafter, even if such time is after the period of limitations, is held in some jurisdictions not to apply to a limitation of time found in an insurance policy.¹⁵ A provision of a statute specifically applying to suits against insurance companies, giving the further time of a year after non-suit prevents a limitation of time in an insurance policy.¹⁶

Under the power of the court to apply these provisions so that they shall operate in a reasonable manner, bringing an earlier suit within the time limited which was dismissed for a ground other than on the merits,¹⁷ as for being brought in the name of the wrong party,¹⁸ is a sufficient excuse for not bringing the action in the time limited, so that it can be brought afterward. So where suit is impossible, as where the officers

Provisions that no action can be brought unless a claim for damages has been presented within a certain period after loss, or damage, are often presented for adjudication. If fair and reasonable they are generally upheld, as in contracts with telegraph companies,¹ though there is authority to the contrary.²

If the regulation is unreasonable, the courts refuse to enforce it.⁷ Thus a provision requiring notice of loss to be given within thirty days from the date of the bill of lading is unreasonable if the carrier requires its agents to hold undelivered packages thirty days before returning them to the consignor.⁸ But a provision requiring notice of loss thirty days from the date of the bill of lading is reasonable where the loss was known to the shippers within a week after the date of the bill of lading.⁹ If the date of delivery or knowledge of the loss is taken as the date from which the period is to run, a shorter period will be held to be reasonable than if the period began at the date of the bill of lading. Thus ten days,¹⁰ five days,¹¹ and thirty hours,¹² have each been held reasonable. So a provision requiring notice of injury to live stock to be given before it is removed from the place of destination is reasonable.¹³ On the other hand, thirty days¹⁴ and thirty-six hours,¹⁵ have been held unreasonable. So in contracts with telegraph companies a provision that a claim must be presented within sixty days from the filing of the message for transmission is reasonable.¹⁶ A contractual provision limiting the time for presenting claims may be waived by the insurer expressly or impliedly.¹⁷

§358. Contracts forbidding suit for certain time after loss.

Provisions are often found in contracts forbidding an action to be brought within a certain time after the happening of the event which fixes liability. Such provisions, if reasonable, are valid at Common Law.¹ If the local statute fixes the time in which suit can first be brought, such provision controls if less than that fixed by the contract. Such a contractual provision may be waived, as by denying all liability.³

CONTRACTS WAIVING THE PERFORMANCE OF DUTIES IMPOSED BY LAW.

§359. Contracts relieving common carriers of goods from liability for negligence.

A common carrier of goods is liable, in the absence of special agreement, as an insurer of goods carried by him, except for losses caused by the act of God or the public enemy. To what extent he can by special contract relieve himself in advance from this liability is a question often presented for adjudication. The weight of modern authority is that within limits he can modify his Common Law liability,¹ if not forbidden by statute, provided such limitation is reasonable,² and it is for the carrier to show that such limitation is reasonable.³ The limit fixed by the great majority of the courts is that a com-liability for gross negligence.⁵ The later cases presented the question of ordinary negligence and were decided adverse to the right of the carrier to exonerate himself from liability for any degree of negligence.⁶ In Illinois the carrier may exempt himself from all liability except for gross negligence;⁷ and the New York courts recognize his right to exempt himself from all liability for negligence of his servants.⁸ He cannot relieve himself by contract from the consequences of his wilful misconduct.⁹ The reason generally assigned by the courts for the rule held by the majority of the courts is that common carriers have public as well as private functions, are endowed with the power of eminent domain, and do not stand on an equality with shippers. The public has therefore an interest in their contracts as common carriers, and in the enforcement of their liability.¹⁰

¹⁰ "The carrier and shipper do not stand on equal terms. The latter cannot afford to refuse that which the carrier demands as a condition to the transportation of his goods, and in ninety-nine cases out of every hundred, if he does so refuse, he will find himself discriminated against until his business is ruined and he has nothing left to ship. The rule that stipulations insisted on by carriers or other persons who stand in such a position towards their customers as enables them to compel compliance with their demands, or destroy their customer's business, should be judged of by their fair-

Where this rule is applied a contract for exemption from liability for negligence,¹¹ as against all but gross negligence,¹² or even as against all but slight negligence,¹³ is invalid. Thus a contract relieving the carrier from liability for injuries due to fire,¹⁴ water,¹⁵ or decay,¹⁶ do not relieve him from such liability if due to his negligence. So a contract relieving the carrier from liability for damages due to the breakdown of refrigerating machinery does not relieve him from damage caused by failure to have such machinery in good condition when the voyage began.¹⁷ So where the carrier seeks by contract to end his liability with the arrival of the goods at their destination, the law, notwithstanding, ignores this provision and gives the consignee a reasonable time in which to remove the goods.¹⁸ Even a contract to insure goods for the benefit of ness and held void whenever they are unreasonable or oppressive, is one of very general acceptance. Public policy compels its acceptance in all civilized countries." Willock v. R. R., 166 Pa. St. 184, 191; 45 Am. St. Rep. 674, 678; 27 L. R. A. 228; 30 Atl. 948.

the shipper and to look solely to the insurance in case of loss, cannot relieve the carrier from liability for negligence.¹⁹ This prohibition applies only to contracts for exemption from liability. In other respects the common carrier may modify his rights by contract. Thus the common carrier may contract, irrespective of his own negligence, for the benefit of insurance held by the shipper.²⁰ In some jurisdictions statutes have been passed providing that no contract limiting the legal liability of a common carrier is binding, and such statutes have been upheld as constitutional.²¹ The carrier may, however, limit his liability to shipment over his own road.²²

§360. Contracts fixing value of goods shipped.

A common carrier often attempts to fix the value of the articles shipped over its line, by contract made with the shipper in advance, for the purpose of determining the amount of liability in case of loss. If the rate paid by the shipper depends on the value of the goods, he is generally, in the absence of statute, held bound by a reasonable valuation agreed upon between himself and the carrier at the time of shipment, even if the loss is due to the negligence of the carrier.¹ This principle is often applied in contracts for the transportation of live stock.² If the shipper deceives the carrier as to the value of the goods shipped for the purpose of getting a lower rate, either by specific statements³ or by the method of packing the goods,⁴ he is bound by such estimate of value. Accordingly as the carrier's risk is limited to the apparent value of the goods shipped, it cannot on learning the true character of the goods after delivery recover additional compensation.⁵ The carrier must give the shipper the option between shipping under the Common-Law liability and under the limited liability.⁶

If the value put upon the goods is not in consideration of a lower rate for a lower valuation, but is fixed arbitrarily by the shipper without reference to the actual value of the goods to limit his liability, such provision is void.⁷ Such valuation must be reasonable. In some states a valuation greatly below the true value is held unreasonable even if the carrier does not know the true value, provided the shipper is not guilty of fraud.⁸ A stipulation that the carrier will not be liable for any package of a value greater than one hundred dollars is not a limitation of liability to that sum but an attempt to evade all liability for articles worth more than that sum and is void.⁹ So a provision limiting the liability of a carrier of baggage to two hundred fifty francs is void.¹⁰ In Illinois such limitation seems valid except where the loss is caused by gross negligence of the carrier.¹¹

There are, however, some jurisdictions which hold that no limitation of value, though fair and reasonable and in consideration of reduced rates, can free a common carrier from liability for full value if the damage is due to the negligence of the carrier or his servants.¹² Under statutes forbidding carriers to limit their Common-Law liability by contract, a limitation on the amount of damage is invalid.¹³ So where such provision is found in the constitution such limitation is invalid.¹⁴ Such statutes cannot affect interstate commerce.¹⁵ Under a statute forbidding a carrier to exempt himself by contract from his liability, the shipper is not bound by the value fixed by him even if fixed too low in fraud of the railway company.¹⁶ In some jurisdictions a contract limiting the amount of recovery to the value of the goods at the time and place of shipment is held valid.¹⁷ This seems to exclude the value added by the transportation contracted and often paid for. In Minnesota for this reason such contracts were held invalid,¹⁸ but subsequently such language was held not to exclude the freight paid or agreed to be paid; and such contracts were held valid.¹⁹

Under statutes forbidding carriers to contract for less than Common-Law liability a custom requiring the shipper of stock to agree that his damage shall not exceed the cash value of his stock at the place of shipment is invalid.²⁰ But such stipulation is valid as to interstate shipments.²¹ A contract limiting the amount for which the carrier is liable in case of loss is strictly construed if held valid. Such a contract does not in any way affect the amount of the liability of a carrier for non-compliance with a demand by the shipper to stop the goods in transitu.²²

§361. Contracts relieving carriers of live stock from liability.

The rule that a common carrier cannot relieve himself from liability for injuries due to his own negligence applies to carriers of live stock.¹ This qualification, however, must be made. The peculiarity of handling live-stock makes shippers often willing to agree to load, care for, feed, water and unload their own stock at their risk. Such contracts are valid.² So it has been held that a carrier of live-stock may contract for the liability of a private carrier.³ Under the Kansas statute which forbids a carrier to contract for less than a Common-Law liability unless otherwise ordered by a board of railroad commissioners and an order from such board permitted contracts restricting liability except in case of negligence, such contracts are valid.⁴ So under such contract the carrier is not liable for damage caused by the shipper's over-loading the car,⁵ nor for lost animals.⁶ Under such a statute a common carrier of live-stock cannot insist on a written notice to himself before delivery of the stock.⁷ Even under such contract, however, the carrier is liable if he does not give the shipper proper facilities for feeding, watering and otherwise caring for his stock;⁸ or if the carrier unloads the stock himself without giving the shipper reasonable opportunity so to do.⁹

A carrier of passengers while not an insurer of their safety, owes them a very high degree of care in providing therefor.¹ Considerations similar to those obtaining in the case of a carrier of goods, make a contract of a common carrier of passengers invalid insofar as it seeks to free him from liability for his own negligence.² Thus a covenant in a mileage book whereby the railroad is released from liability for injuries received by the passenger when riding "upon any freight train desig-courts hold that such provisions are void.¹¹ A covenant fixing the maximum amount of recovery in case of injury to a passenger does not affect the amount recoverable in an action by his personal representative for causing his death.¹² Such a covenant is void as to the passenger if unreasonable.¹³

Harter act⁶ was intended to relieve a ship-owner from liability if he used due diligence in making his vessel seaworthy; and to exempt him from loss due to fault or error in navigation.⁷ Neither prior to⁸ nor subsequent to⁹ such act, could a ship-owner free himself from liability for unseaworthiness existing at the beginning of the voyage which could be discovered by due diligence. So a clause providing that dressed beef should be carried at the owner's risk was ineffectual to relieve him from liability for loss due to a failure to have the refrigerating machines in condition when the voyage began.¹⁰ Such act gives no power to put an arbitrary limit to the amount for which the carrier will be liable.¹¹

§364. Common carrier contracting as private carrier.

A distinction is made between such duties as a common carrier is bound to perform irrespective of special contract and such as he is not so bound to perform, but may perform on his own terms and conditions¹ He may make a valid contract for exemption from liability for negligence as to the latter. So a common carrier may make such contract as he pleases for the transportation of goods which he is not bound to carry, such as explosives.² Since a railroad is not bound to have cars belonging to, and in charge of another, it may do so on such terms as it chooses,³ and may exonerate itself from liability for restaurant keeper to travel on the train to sell refreshments, the railroad to be free from all liability for injury to him is valid.¹⁰ A similar contract between a porter and a sleeping-car company, and a sleeping-car company and a railroad was held valid.¹¹ In order to protect the railroad company from liability the injured employee must have agreed to waive his right of action for injury. An employee of one company who is injured by the negligence of another company, such as a railroad, is not bound by the terms of a contract between the two companies freeing each other from liability for negligence if he does not acquiesce therein.¹² Thus a contract between a railroad company and an express company whereby the express company releases the railroad company from liability for injuries received by the employees of the express company does not affect the right of an employee to recover if he did not know of such contract.¹³ Thus if a mail clerk does not waive his claim for damages he may hold the railroad for damages caused by its negligence.¹⁴ So a contract between a shipper of live stock and a carrier providing that the person in charge of the live stock shall assume all risk of injury is not binding on such person if he does not acquiesce therein.¹⁵

§365. Insurance by common carrier.

The rule that a common carrier cannot by contract relieve himself from liability for the negligence of himself or his employees does not prevent him from contracting with an insurer for indemnity against losses arising out of his liability as a common carrier,¹ nor from contracting with a news company for indemnity from liability for injuries to the employees of such news company,² nor does it prevent a receiver from leas-

§366. Contracts relieving telegraph companies from liability for negligence.

A contract relieving a telegraph company from liability for negligence in transmitting a message is invalid in some jurisdictions;¹ as is a provision limiting liability to the cost of an unrepeatd message,² or otherwise limiting the liability of the telegraph company unless the message is repeated at an additional charge to the sender:³ while in other jurisdictions such §367. Contracts relieving employer from liability to employee for negligence.

It is generally held that an employer cannot by contract in advance release himself from liability for injury to his employee caused by his own negligence, or caused by the negligence of superior employees if by the law of the jurisdiction he is responsible for their negligence.¹ Invalid contracts of this class are most commonly entered into between railroads and their employees.² So a contract whereby the next of kin of an employee of a railroad released the railroad from all liability to himself for any injury to such employee was held void.³ Even where power is given to a railroad to "farm out" its right of transportation, it cannot insert a valid provision in a lease exonerating itself from liability to lessee's employees from lessee's negligence.⁴

There is, however, some authority for upholding a contract which waives in advance liability for negligence.⁵ Thus a contract between a street car company and its employees that it should not be liable for any injuries to them while they were on its cars, even if due to its own negligence was held valid.⁶ In Texas a contract by a father consenting to the employment of his minor son by a railroad not to hold them for damages if the son is injured is a bar to an action by the parent for damages,⁷ except such as are outside of the ordinary risks of the employment.⁸ A contract whereby the employee is required to make careful inspection of the railway on which he is to work, is held, to charge him with knowledge of visible dangers, such as adjoining buildings, overhanging bridges and the like.⁹ In some jurisdictions the employee may waive all liability for negligence except for such gross negligence as is criminal in its nature.¹⁰ A contract whereby a father released the railroad company from liability to him for any injury to his minor son, an employee of the road, has been held valid as to injuries caused by negligence as long as such negligence is not criminal.¹¹ On principle the same rules should apply to common carriers in their capacity of employers as to any other employers, and the reasons given by the courts in deciding the cases in which common carriers are parties do not suggest any distinction.¹²

A contract which gives an employee injured by his employer's negligence an alternative right to exact damages by action or to accept other compensation specified in such contract is valid, such as a contract which provides for forming a relief fund, in part from assessments upon the employees, and provides that in case of injury a resort to such relief fund for benefits will preclude a right of action for damages,¹³ even under a statute which forbids a railroad to exempt itself from liability by contract.¹⁴ Bringing suit for damages prevents recovery on a beneficial certificate containing such condition.¹⁵ However the act of a widow in accepting such relief does not pre-

The rule that a common carrier cannot by contract relieve himself from liability for the negligence of himself or his employees has no application to provisions in leases given by such carrier for buildings owned by him on or near the right of way, exempting him from liability for loss by fire.¹ Accordingly an insurance company which has paid a loss upon a building erected under such a contract has no right of action against the railroad company, though such loss was caused by the latter, there being no wilful lack of due care.² A contract between a landlord and a corporation which becomes his tenant that he shall not be responsible for injuries from the elevator, is not binding individually on an officer of the corporation though he attested the contract and knew its contents.³

A bailee may by contract relieve himself from liability for negligence. Thus the contract between the World's Columbian Exposition Company and all exhibitors, whereby it was re-

Municipal Corporation.—A contract between a city and a property owner who wishes to make a sewer connection whereby he agrees to hold the city harmless from any damage resulting from such connection is void as to a subsequent purchaser from such party.⁴

§371. General doctrine of contracts relieving from liability for negligence.

The validity of contracts relieving from liability for negligence cannot, therefore, be stated in broad and general terms. Common carriers, telegraph companies, and employers, cannot by the weight of authority relieve themselves from this liability; while private carriers, landlords, and bailees, can. The rule as to common carriers and telegraph companies is based on the theory that they owe duties to the public of which they cannot divest themselves; and the reasoning employed would imply that private persons, not charged with special duties to the public could free themselves by contract from liability for negligence. The reasoning adopted in holding that employers cannot by contract relieve themselves in advance from liability to their employees for their negligence, would seem to imply that all contracts for freedom from liability for negligence are invalid; unless it can be explained by holding that in entering into a contract of employment, employer and employee are not on equal terms. The reasoning in the cases of private carriers, landlords and bailees, seems to imply that contracts relieving from liability for ordinary negligence are valid in the absence of special circumstances.

§372. Contracts relieving from liability after loss.

After damage, by negligence or otherwise, the parties may agree upon a compromise or settlement of the claim for damages.¹ The doctrines concerning the validity of contracts relieving against liability in advance, have no application to contracts made after the loss is sustained.

CHAPTER XIX.

CONTRACTS IN RESTRAINT OF TRADE AND OF ALIENATION.

§373. Contracts in restraint of trade distinguished from monopoly contracts.

Contracts whereby one or both of the parties thereto are restrained from engaging in a business, trade, or profession are of two kinds: (a) those which are a part of a transaction involving the good-will of a business, which are designed to protect such good-will, and to that end to restrain some person or persons from engaging in business, and (b) those which have for their primary object not the protection of good-will, but the formation of a monopoly in a given business. The first class, if objectionable at all, is so because the restraint is unreasonable; the second class is always illegal. When contracts in restraint of trade first came before the English courts they were treated as necessarily illegal and invalid.¹ This view undoubtedly was taken because contracts in restraint of trade were confused with contracts tending to create a monopoly. The next step in the development of this doctrine was to recognize that some contracts in restraint of trade might be valid, if the restraint was reasonable and designed merely to protect good-will.² Unfortunately the confusion between contracts whose sole objectionable feature was that they were in restraint of trade, and contracts objectionable as tending to a monopoly, persisted for some time, and some of the earlier

American cases treat monopoly contracts as if their sole objectionable feature were that they were in restraint of trade and as if monopoly contracts not transcending the limits fixed for contracts in restraint of trade must necessarily be valid;³ and the failure to make this distinction is the cause of some confusion in the later cases.⁴ The present attitude of the law is that contracts which do not aim to stifle competition but merely to transfer a business and good-will from one person to another,⁵ are very different in their effect from those which aim to stifle competition and to build up a monopoly.⁶

§374. Nature of contracts in restraint of trade.

Good-will is "the probability that the old customers will resort to the old place for the purpose of trade."¹ It is recognized by the law as a right of value which may be sold. The mere sale of a good-will does not imply a covenant by the vendor not to compete.² It is evident, however, that a sale of good-will, without any provision restraining the vendor from promptly destroying such good-will by opening a new place of business and drawing his old customers to himself, would be a mockery. Accordingly, if not unreasonable,³ a contract restraining the vendor of good-will from re-entering business to the ruin of the §376. Area of restraint.—Area less than entire country.

A sharp divergence of authority arises on the question of when the area involved is so great that the contract is injurious to the public interest. The rule as originally laid down in England, and as still in force in perhaps the majority of the jurisdictions in the United States, is that the area of restriction must not be so large that the public interest suffers, even though the business whose good-will is to be sold extends over the entire area, and that a contract covering such an area is unreasonable and void. Where this doctrine is in force, contracts in restraint of trade, extending over no larger area than necessary to protect the good-will involved, are valid if limited to the area of a village or a city,¹ or a part thereof,² or the §377. Area including entire country.—Original rule.

The divergent views are most sharply contrasted when the contract provides for an area of restraint which while no larger than necessary to protect the good-will of the business in question, is yet so large as to include the entire area of the country in whose courts the suit is brought. It is evident that on the one hand such a contract prevents the promisor from carrying on business in that state, and to that extent it tends to diminish the state's population, resources and wealth. On the other hand such a contract is not intended to do more than protect the good-will of a business in a legitimate way; and it is only the wide extent of the business in question that makes so wide an area of restraint necessary. The earlier English cases held restraints unreasonable which extended over the entire country,¹ while later cases have explained the earlier ones as being cases in which the area of restraint was wider than necessary to protect the business and hence unreasonable.² The early decisions have been followed in many states before the later explanations were made; and many American courts hold that a contract in restraint of trade which involves the whole area of a state,³ or substantially the whole of a state,⁴ or several states,⁵ or the whole of the United States,⁶ or which has no restrictions as to space⁷ are invalid. Thus in Price v. Green, 16 M. & W. 346, a covenant not to engage in business in London or within six hundred miles thereof was attacked by defendant as void because that included England, Wales, and nineteen-twentieths of Scotland. Its invalidity outside of London was conceded, the only question argued being as to whether it was valid as to London. It was held valid as to such city, and this was really all that plaintiff had claimed.

The later English rule followed by some American courts is that as long as the area within which trade is restrained is no greater than was covered by the business whose good-will is in question, the contract is not injurious to the public interest and is valid.¹ "The test is to be applied according to the circumstances of the contract and is not to be arbitrarily limited by boundaries of time and space."² Where this view is entertained and the extent of the business in question justifies it, a contract which restrains business over the entire area of a country, as Great Britain,³ or the United States,⁴ or the District of Columbia,⁵ or over several states of the Union,⁶ or

Whether the early English theory or the modern one is adopted the courts are agreed upon the rule that the area of restraint must not be larger than is necessary to protect the goodwill of the business in question. A restraint covering a greater area is void.¹ Thus a contract by a teacher of foreign lanor in a given county or state or the United States,⁷ may be in each case valid as to such county and void as to the rest of the area contracted for. The doctrine that restraint is void if unreasonable is not limited to area. If for any reason the restraint is greater than is necessary to protect the good-will, the contract is invalid. Thus while an employee may within reasonable limits be prevented by his contract from competing with his employer after his employment ends,⁸ a contract restraining him from engaging in a business not competing with his employer's is unreasonable. Thus a contract was held invalid by which the employee was not to engage in any kind of business for three years after his employment ended, within fifteen miles of the place where his employer's business was located.⁹

ness in question. Indeed, if limited as to space so as to be reasonable a contract in restraint of trade, is valid though it is to last for the life of the promisee,⁹ or though no time limit is imposed;¹⁰ if necessary for the protection of the good-will, an express agreement not to compete as long as the adversary party continues in the business is valid.¹¹ Conversely, if a contract in restraint of trade covers an unreasonable space, a limitation in point of time will not make it valid.¹² By statute in California a contract in restraint of trade can extend only to a specified county, city, or a part thereof, and can last only so long as the buyer or any person deriving title to the good-will from him, carries on a like business therein. This rule does not introduce a new principle of law, but "it simply eliminates from the controversy arising on such restriction the question as to what is a reasonable territorial limit."¹³ Other jurisdictions paid by vendee,⁹ or a covenant whereby the grantor (a railroad) agrees, on consideration that grantee would erect a hotel on the property conveyed, to maintain a permanent station at that point and to dissuade others from erecting hotels there,¹⁰ are all valid. The question in such cases is whether such restraint is reasonable. So an agreement, in consideration of dismissing an action to prevent the use of the property for the business in question on the ground that it is a nuisance, whereby the owner of such property agrees that such business shall not be carried on therein for five years is valid.¹¹ So a covenant on the part of a lessor, who leases part of his department store to a firm to sell glassware, not to engage in the sale of such article during the term of the lease is valid.¹² A covenant against the sale of intoxicating liquors is held to be waived if the grantor permits the sale of such liquor on other realty conveyed by the same grantor under the same conditions, since such provision would under these circumstances tend to create a monopoly.¹³

A contract in restraint of alienation is not void if not unreasonable. An agreement restricting the purchase of shares in an association may be valid.¹ Thus an agreement between stockholders that in case of the death of one, the survivors should have an option to purchase the stock of the decedent at its value, is not invalid.² An agreement between stockholders that individual stock shall not be sold for a certain time so as to create a market for treasury stock, is valid.³ A contract

WAGER INSURANCE.

§383. Nature of wager insurance.

Wager insurance is insurance on life or property effected by one who has no insurable interest therein. The history of wager insurance at Common Law is a matter of dispute; some authorities holding that it was valid as were wagers in general,¹ and that its invalidity in England was solely due to statute,² while other authorities take the view that wager insurance was invalid as being a class of wagers not enforced because contrary to public policy;³ and that the English statutes on the subject were merely declaratory of the Common Law.⁴ Another theory is that such insurance is invalid not because it is a wager but because it gives to a party who has no special interest of any sort in preserving the life or property insured, a financial interest in its destruction.⁵

§384. Insurable interest in one's own life.

As a person has an insurable interest in his own life,¹ he may insure his life for the benefit of another who has no insurable tract was a mere wager as far as the assignee was concerned.⁵ Such defense can be interposed only by the insurer. If the insured reserves the right to change the beneficiary the original beneficiary cannot complain of such assignment.⁶ So if A has an insurable interest in B's life and effects insurance thereon and assigns such policy to X, X may recover thereon.⁷ The right of the assignee to recover is still clearer where he has an insurable interest in the life of the assignor.⁸ As between a creditor who is the assignee of his debtor's life insurance policy, and the representatives of the debtor, the tendency is to treat the assignment as one for security only; and to hold the assignee liable to the representatives of the insured for any excess above his claim;⁹ and it has been held, in apparent contradiction to the views heretofore expressed that a creditor cannot take by assignment any greater interest than enough to protect his claim, and that on collecting the policy, he is liable for the excess to the representatives of the insured.¹⁰

Such insurance is valid except (a) where the transaction is merely a subterfuge to enable such third person to effect wager insurance indirectly which he could not effect directly.¹¹ A contract by which one who has no insurable interest is to have a policy made out for his benefit in consideration of his paying the premiums,¹² or paying a sum of money to the widow

An insurable interest in life consists in "a reasonable ground, founded upon the relations of the parties to each other, either pecuniary or of blood or affinity to expect some benefit or advantage from the continuance of the life of the assured."¹ Among the relations by blood, a parent is held to have an insurable interest in the life of his child, at least if a minor;² and a child in the life of his parent.³ A sister has an insurable interest in the life of her brother.⁴ An aunt has no insurable interest in the life of her nephew.⁵ An insurable interest always exists in one who stands in loco parentis to the beneficiary.⁶ An aunt who has supported her niece, so that she may reasonably expect that the niece will assist her, has an insurable interest in her life.⁷

Of the relations by affinity a wife has an insurable interest in her husband's life,¹ even if she is divorced after the policy

§387. Pecuniary relations.

Of the parties sustaining pecuniary relations to each other, a creditor has an insurable interest in the life of his debtor to the extent of his debt,¹ including the cost of taking out the policy and keeping it up.² What excess in the amount of the policy over the amount of the debt makes the contract a wager is a question on which the courts are not harmonious. A policy of four,³ six,⁴ or ten times⁵ the amount of the debt, has been upheld;⁶ on the other hand a policy of thirty⁷ or forty⁸ times the debt, is held invalid. A contract to keep up insurance, paying all premiums, for nine-tenths of the policy, was held invalid on this principle.⁹ But here there seems to have been no debt other than payment of premiums under the contract under which the policy was taken out. If the rule that the cost of keeping up the policy may be included in the amount of the policy is correct, it is hard to see what limit can be placed in advance to the amount of the policy, since according to the tables of mortality the average policy costs more than insured receives. This interest is not lost by the creditor's taking a partial dividend as payment in full under an assignment,¹⁰ or by the debt's becoming barred by limitations,¹¹ or by discharge in bankruptcy.¹² A surety has an insurable interest in the life of his principal.¹³ A partner has as such no insurable interest in the life of a co-partner.¹⁴ If one of the partners is to perform personal services under the partnership contract,¹⁵ or is indebted to the firm,¹⁶ the other partners have an insurable interest in his life. ance of property, the insurable interest need not exist when the policy is taken out. It is sufficient if it exists when the loss occurs.² Illustrations of a few of the many classes of insurable interests, with some of the enormous number of cases on this topic, will be given. The owner³ has an insurable interest in his own property, even if the loss must ultimately fall on another, as where A owns an uncompleted building, the loss of which, if destroyed without insurance, is by contract to fall on the contractors,⁴ or if he has mortgaged the property insured,⁵ or if he holds the legal title merely, the equitable interest being in another,⁶ or where he has contracted for its sale but part of the purchase price is unpaid.⁷ A mortgagor who has mortgaged land for his personal debt and then sold his equity, has an insurable interest therein until his debt is paid.⁸ One put in possession of land by his father, with the assurance that it is devised to him, has an insurable interest therein, though his father bought the land at a partition sale, which has not yet been confirmed.⁹ One who is in possession under a quitclaim deed and who has erected valuable improvements has an insurable interest.¹⁰ The fact that the owner has by contract with a railroad company released all claim for subsequent damage from fire, does not prevent him from having an insurable interest.¹¹ It has been held that the owner may effect insurance on his property, payable to one having no insurable interest therein.¹² On the other hand it has even held that an assignment of a fire insurance policy by the owner to one who has no beneficial interest in the property insured gives the assignee no interest and avoids the policy.¹³ If, however, the assignment is made as collateral only, the owner retaining the ultimate interest under the policy, the assignment is void, but the policy is not made invalid.¹⁴

The owner of any estate or interest in property has an insurable interest therein. Thus a tenant by the entirety,¹ a tenant by curtesy,² the occupant of a legal homestead,³ a lessee,⁴ and even a tenant at will, if entitled to notice to quit,⁵ have all insurable interests. In substantially all jurisdictions wager insurance is now held invalid.¹ Such insurance differs from ordinary wager contracts in that it is void merely, and not illegal. Thus if A agrees that B may take wager insurance on A's life and the insurance company pays the policy to B on A's death, A's representatives may recover.² If the insurance company has not paid B, A's representatives may recover the amount of the policy from the company.³

ILLEGAL CONTRACTS—CONTRACTS TENDING TO DISTURB PUBLIC PEACE, ORDER AND MORALITY.

§395. Contracts to commit treason.

Contracts in aid of a public enemy or a domestic insurgent are invalid. The chief class of such contracts involved in litigation in this country are contracts to aid the Confederate forces during the Civil War,¹ such as contracts to furnish guns,² horses,³ mules,⁴ cloth for uniforms,⁵ or services as a substitute,⁶ all of which are held invalid.⁷ So a purchase of cotton from the Confederate government has been held illegal.⁸

An executory contract on consideration of Confederate money has been held valid in some states, if made within the Confederate lines,⁹ and illegal and invalid in others.¹⁰ If

A promise to pay a note in Tennessee money or Confederate bonds was held valid, and enforced as a promise to pay Tennessee money. Hanauer v. Gray, 25 Ark. 350; 99 Am. Dec. 226. So where payable in state warrants issued in aid of the Confederate cause. Houston, etc., Ry. v. Texas, 177 U. S. 66.

a contract on consideration of Confederate money is executed, it will not be set aside by the courts.¹¹ An investment of a ward's estate in Confederate bonds has been held proper if made by a guardian who resided in the Confederate lines when the war broke out,¹² but improper where the guardian lived without the Confederate lines when the war broke out, and thereafter took the property within the Confederate lines and there invested it in Confederate bonds.¹³

A contract to aid in making war on a friendly state is invalid. Thus a contract to lend money to aid Texas in her war of independence with Mexico, before the United States had recognized the independence of Texas, was held invalid.¹⁴

§396. Contracts to commit other crime.

So if an act is made criminal, either by statute¹ or at Common Law,² whether felony³ or misdemeanor,⁴ a contract to perform such act is illegal. Thus no recovery can be had for storing game during such time of the year as it is a misdemeanor to have game in possession,⁵ or for threshing wheat with a thresher the machinery of which is not boxed in, which omission to box in is a misdemeanor.⁶ A provision in a lease whereby the lessor agrees to protect the lessee from the consequences of maintaining a public nuisance is illegal.⁷ A contract for the support or hire of a person for life is valid. The fact that it may give a remote interest in causing the death of such employee is no objection thereto.⁸ So a certificate of permanent scholarship in a college is valid.⁹ It has been intimated that a contract to pay insurance, even if the insured commits suicide, is void, as tending to encourage suicide.¹⁰

Contracts to be performed at the death of a given person are not invalid on that account. The interest given to one person in causing the death of another by means of such a contract is not regarded as such an inducement to commit murder that the courts should on that account declare such contracts void or illegal. Thus a note payable at the maker's death is valid.¹ So a contract that A's executors shall pay B after A's death is valid.² So a contract between A, who has been divorced from his wife, X, and B to intermarry when X dies is not invalid.³ So a contract whereby A agrees to make a will in favor of B⁴ is not of itself void on any ground of public policy. A contract whereby A agrees to make B his "heir" is held invalid in some jurisdictions⁵ on the somewhat technical ground that one cannot constitute another his "heir" except by complying with statutes for designating an heir,⁶ and that a contract to make an heir is invalid if not in compliance with statute. The popular meaning of "heir" in such connection is undoubtedly that of "devisee" or "legatee,"⁷ and accordingly such contract is upheld, as amounting simply to a contract to make a will.⁸

§398. Contract to commit breach of the peace.

Parties cannot contract for permission to one to inflict wilful injury thereafter on the person of the other which amounts to a breach of the peace. Thus a contract to fight is no bar to an action for such assault and battery,¹ nor does it relieve against criminal liability.² A contract which tends to cause breach of the peace is invalid; as a clause allowing the customers of a water company to take by force such water as they demand if the company refuses to deliver it.³ On the other hand, if there is no breach of the peace, agreement may prevent what would otherwise have been an assault from being either a tort or a crime.⁴

By statute in many jurisdictions the sale of intoxicating liquors is forbidden, either totally, or to a limited extent, or in the absence of certain circumstances. Such statutes are intended to prevent or restrict the sale of intoxicating liquors, and sales in violation of such statutes are illegal. No recovery, accordingly, can be had for the purchase price of liquor so sold,¹ especially where such contracts are made void by the express terms of the statute;² nor can a tenant under a lease of property for the illegal sale of liquor maintain an action against the landlord for a breach of contract.³ The methods in which these statutes can be violated are as manifold as the statutes themselves. No recovery can be had for sales of intoxicating liquors in violation of statutes requiring a license to be taken out for permission to make such sales and making it a crime to sell without such license,⁴ nor for commissions for making sales of such liquors where neither principal nor agent was licensed.⁵ No recovery can be had for sales made before the vendor has paid his tax and filed his bond if this is required by statute.⁶ So if by law the vendor may sell only on his premises, delivering liquor elsewhere is illegal.⁷ So if by law no liquor can be sold to be drunk on the premises, no recovery can be had for such sales.⁸ Some statutes provide that liquor cannot be sold in quantities less than fixed by statute. No recovery can be had for the sale of a smaller quantity;⁹ but such statute does not make void the payment of a debt by delivering liquor in smaller quantities.¹⁰ The pleadings and proof must establish the fact that the sale was in less than the quantity fixed by statute, to make it illegal.¹¹ So no recovery can be had for liquor sold to an habitual drunkard after notice given by his wife to vendor not to sell.¹² So if the statute requires sales of intoxicating liquors to be for cash only, no recovery can be had for sales on credit.¹³ Under the South Carolina statute, however, it has been held that the question of the validity of the sale of intoxicating liquor sold in violation of the statute can be raised only by the state.¹⁴ Since such contracts are invalid, no recovery thereon can be had, even if a subsequent express promise to pay therefor is made.¹⁵

In the absence of statute, there is nothing illegal in the sale of intoxicating liquor. Accordingly sales made in compliance with the statute are legal. If the license is paid it is lawful to sell liquor, and a lease¹⁶ or loan of money¹⁷ for that purpose is valid, as is a contract to indemnify a surety on a liquor dealer's bond.¹⁸ So recovery can be had for the sale of wood alcohol, a substance not suitable for use as a beverage.¹⁹ intercourse before marriage,² or a contract to make a will³ is illegal. If a valid contract to marry has been entered into, subsequent unlawful intercourse, under promise to marry at once if pregnancy ensues, does not avoid the original valid contract.⁴ No allowance can be made on a claim against decedent's estate for services as domestic servant rendered by one who was living with decedent as his mistress when such services were rendered,⁵ even on an express promise to pay therefor.⁶ But if services were rendered without reference to any unlawful relations existing between the parties, recovery can be had therefor, even though the parties were also maintaining unlawful relations,⁷ as where the services were rendered for some time before unlawful relations began.⁸ A woman living in such relations with a man may recover for money loaned by her to him.⁹

A past consideration is no consideration, but merely a motive.¹⁰ Hence a contract for past unlawful intercourse is not on that account alone invalid, if supported by sufficient consideration or under seal.¹¹ The commonest forms of such contracts are compromises of bastardy proceedings,¹² or contracts to support the bastard offspring of such unlawful intercourse,

CONTRACTS TENDING TO INJURE THIRD PERSONS.

§401. Contracts to invade the legal rights of others.

A contract between A and B to invade the legal rights of C is illegal.¹ A contract to cause a legislative investigation of the affairs of a corporation, thereby depressing its market value, and to share in profits from "short" sales of such stock is void.² A contract between A and B to commit a tort against C's person,³ reputation⁴ or property⁵ is invalid.⁶ Under these principles a contract to take possession of public property or to injure it, is illegal.⁷ Examples of such contracts are those to keep cattle on government land where such keeping is forbidden,⁸ to sink a shaft in a public street,⁹ or to build a wall out into a lake, the title to the ground underlying which is in the state,¹⁰ or a lease of lands in an Indian reservation, made by an Indian without authority from acts of Congress.¹¹ A contract between A and B whereby B agrees to break a pre-existing contract with C, as a contract of bailment,¹² or a promise of marriage,¹³ is invalid.

A person has the right of dealing with whomsoever he pleases. Accordingly a contract between an employer and a store-keeper whereby the employer agrees to influence his employees to buy of the store-keeper and to accept no orders against the wages of his employees given to any other store-keeper is unlawful at Common Law.¹⁴ In many states, statutes specifically forbid employers to pay their employees in checks, orders or anything but money; and contracts in violation of such statutes are void.¹⁵ Hence a purchaser of such checks or orders cannot enforce them against the employer,¹⁶ and a contract between an employer and a store-keeper, requiring the latter to keep a store and to redeem orders given to the men by the employer is invalid.¹⁷

§402. Contracts to defraud the public.

Contracts which tend to defraud and deceive the general public are illegal.¹ Thus a contract which tends to mislead the public as to the identity of the person rendering services such as a musical director² or physician³ in which the personality of such party is a controlling factor, is void. So contracts tending to deceive the public as to the quality and kind of goods sold,⁴ as a contract to sell at wholesale "domestic sardines," put up in boxes with "fancy labels," which was a way of contracting for a fish not a sardine put up in boxes which purported on the lid to contain imported sardines,⁵ or a contract to assign a trade-mark which purported to designate a particular person as manufacturer⁶ are illegal. "Bohemian Oats" contracts were agreements whereby A sold B oats at an inflated price, took B's note therefor and gave B a bond to sell for him during the following year twice as many bushels of such oats as B had purchased, at the same price. In some jurisdictions these contracts were held wagers;⁷ in others, not.⁸ Some courts hold that such contracts are illegal as they cannot be performed without defrauding a third person.⁹ A contract whereby A agreed that if B would return a given coupon and fifteen dol-

§403. Contracts to defraud third persons.

A contract whereby A and B unite to defraud C must be distinguished from a contract for some lawful purpose into which A by his fraud induces B to enter. The first contract is defective because its subject-matter is illegal; the second, because B's acceptance of A's offer is induced by fraud.¹ Contracts between two persons to wrong or defraud a third are illegal and unenforceable.² Thus a contract whereby a broker is to receive commissions on sales of lots made by him to persons who are induced to buy because such broker pretends to buy some of said lots,³ a contract for advancing money to a stockholder to enable him to recover for his own benefit a judgment which of right belongs to the corporation,⁴ a contract between A and B to get C to bet with them and to win from him by cheating, A getting possession of the entire fund and refusing to pay B his share,⁵ a contract between two out of three co-owners to have the property sold at tax sale to a third party, and then to have him deed it to them free from the claims of the remaining co-owner, such purchaser refusing to carry out the contract, and claiming the land as his own,⁶ are all invalid. So A entered into a scheme with X to represent to B that B's mine was salted and thus obtain it below its value. The mine was really worthless and the plan was really one between B and A's supposed confederate X to sell A the mine. It was held that A was not entitled to any relief in equity.⁷ A contract whereby one creditor who is ostensibly acting with the other creditors contracts for a secret advantage to himself,⁸ as to obtain payment of his debt and then cause an action to set aside a fraudulent conveyance to be dismissed,⁹ or to give one creditor a note in excess of the pro rata share agreed upon by the other creditors, to induce him to consent to the settlement¹⁰ or to pay one creditor a given sum to induce him to withdraw his opposition to the debtor's discharge in bankruptcy,¹¹ or to induce him to sign a compromise agreement,¹² or to induce him to withdraw his support from an action against the debtor brought by himself and other creditors,¹³ is illegal, as it works a fraud on the remaining creditors. No such objections can be urged against contracts which do not tend to defraud third parties. A contract whereby the debtor withdraws his opposition to being adjudicated a bankrupt is valid.¹⁴ A contract whereby A who is not a member of the firm of B & C agrees with X, a creditor of such firm, to assume the liability to him of a member of the firm, though as to the firm A is a creditor, is valid.¹⁵

If A transfers property to B under an agreement intended to defraud A's creditors, A cannot enforce such agreement if B refuses to perform it.¹ Thus if B has agreed to reconvey the property, and refuses to do so, A has no remedy.² This rule is expressed in the other form, that such conveyance is not void, but is voidable at the instance of the creditors injured thereby.³

So if A has conveyed realty to his son B to defraud A's creditors, A cannot invoke such contract to rebut the presumption of an advancement,⁴ nor can A recover if B has promised to pay him for such conveyance and refuses to do so.⁵ So if A conveys property to B to avoid paying alimony, he cannot compel a reconveyance from B.⁶ A mortgage given to defraud the creditors of the mortgagor cannot be enforced.⁷ If there was no consideration for the contract, no recovery can be had on a fraudulent note,⁸ as where such note was given to a bank without consideration to increase its apparent assets and thus deceive inspecting government officials⁹ or mortgage.¹⁰ Where A owned realty on which liquor was sold unlawfully with his knowledge and to establish a false defense in a suit for damages arising from such unlawful sales he deeded the property

The view that the fraudulent vendor can recover is based on the theory that he can make out a prima facie case without invoking the illegal contract. See § 517. It is hard to see, if this is so, why recovery cannot be had on any sale in the performance of an illegal contract; since in all such sales it is possible to sue on the sale without showing the illegality.

to B and took back a note and mortgage to prove that he was in possession as mortgagee, A cannot recover on such note¹¹ while the law will leave the parties where it finds them.¹² There is some divergence of authority in applying this maxim to such contracts. If the fraudulent grantor remains in possession, the weight of authority is that the fraudulent grantee can maintain ejectment,¹³ though there is well-considered authority to the contrary, on the theory that the law will aid neither party.¹⁴ So a judgment confessed in fraud of creditors is valid as between the parties thereto.¹⁵ If the grantee or his heirs reconvey to grantor voluntarily, they cannot subsequently avoid their conveyance,¹⁶ nor can his creditors,¹⁷ and if he attempts to reconvey to the heir of grantor, a mistake as to who the heir is does not give the rightful heir a cause of action to reclaim the land.¹⁸ The unenforceable agreement is that "founded on the unlawful thing done or intended to be done"¹⁹ and does not include other rights. Thus where A gave B a deed absolute on its face but in fact a mortgage to secure an honest debt by giving an unlawful preference, A may redeem.²⁰ So a convey-

Contracts to stifle bidding partake of the nature of contracts in restraint of trade and of contracts to defraud a third person.¹ Contracts between two or more prospective competitors to prevent competition in bids for letting public contracts are invalid.² Where the parties agree to let one party bid, the profits to be divided among them all, no action can be maintained for the recovery of such profits;³ nor can an action be maintained on a promise to pay a certain sum in consideration of refraining from bidding.⁴

Contracts to prevent competitive bidding at judicial sales, or other sales where the property is to be sold to the highest bidder are invalid,⁵ and if one competitor promises to pay another money to refrain from bidding no recovery can be had on such promise.⁶ A contract whereby A agrees to pay B money if B will withdraw an offer that he has made for property belonging to the state and offered by it for sale is invalid whether the sale is a private sale or a public one.⁷ A contract by a guardian to sell his ward's land without the bidding required by law is unenforceable. Hence if another person obtains the land by outbidding the prospective vendee at such sale, such prospective vendee cannot maintain an action against the guardian.⁸ So an agreement made by an administratrix to pay to a prospective vendee any amount in excess of twelve thousand dollars which such vendee is compelled to bid for the realty contracted for cannot be enforced.⁹ The tendency and not the specific result of a contract of this class determines its validity. Such contracts are invalid even if in the particular case competition was not stifled,¹⁰ as where the party agreeing not to bid, bids secretly.¹¹

Contracts with reference to bidding, if invalid, are so because of their working a fraud on third persons.¹² Accordingly agreements between bidders are not invalid if free from fraud upon the party who receives the bids, and bases his contract thereon.¹³ If the party letting the contract does not rely on the bids,¹⁴ or voluntarily lets the contract knowing of the restriction on bidding,¹⁵ or if the party whose property is offered at public sale himself enters into an agreement which involves his abstention from bidding thereat,¹⁶ or if two or more parties neither of whom could bid alone, unite to make a bid possible,¹⁷ such contracts are valid. A contract employing an agent to bid, his compensation to be the difference between the bid he makes and a given sum in excess of which he is forbidden to bid without special instructions from his principal is valid.¹⁸ However, a contract to pool interests in bidding for a public contract and obtain a higher price thereby is not made valid though the city subsequently with full knowledge of the pool pays the contract price.¹⁹ Contracts for mortgaging realty conditioned on the validity of execution sales are valid.²⁰ So a contract to protect one entitled to part of the proceeds of a judicial sale from loss in case such sale is set aside is not necessarily a fraud on the rights of others.²¹ So where public officers at a sale of public property know that the successful bidder is bidding on two lots, one for himself and one for another, such conduct on the part of the bidder is not invalid.²² Contracts between lien-holders whereby one is to bid at a given figure to protect the interests of the others at the public sale are held valid by some courts,²³ and invalid by others.²⁴ An agent in whose hands his principal places money to buy property at a judicial sale cannot refuse to account for the surplus on the ground that his principal bought the property under a contract to stifle competition.²⁵

Whether an agreement between bidders, made after the bids are in, to share the profits, is valid, is a question on which the authorities differ. An agreement between three contractors, who had, without collusion, offered similar bids, to bid among themselves and let the bid go to the one who would pay the largest sum to the others therefor was held invalid.²⁶ A contract between competing architects who have submitted their plans already to divide the reward for the successful plans between themselves is valid.²⁷ A contract between two bidders, one of whom has submitted his bid and the other of whom is about to do so, to form a partnership in such contract if awarded to either, is valid unless it is shown that such contract influenced the bid of one or both.²⁸

A contract by an incorporated state farmers' and laborers' union to sell its franchise for the purchase and sale of different products, is invalid since this franchise is substantially an agency representing subordinate unions.⁷ The agent of A cannot act for B, an adversary party to A, in the same transaction without the assent of both his principals.⁸ If A knows that his agent X is also representing B, but B does not know that X is A's agent, the illegality affects the entire transaction and X cannot recover even from A.⁹ So a contract to release a cashier from individual liability as surety in consideration of his making a loan to his co-sureties of the bank's funds,¹⁰ and a contract between two agents, each representing an adversary principal, to divide their commissions on such transaction¹¹ are invalid. a contract between vendor's agent and vendee's agent to divide between themselves a difference between the price which the vendor has agreed to accept and that which the vendee has agreed to pay, believing that it is the price which the vendor demands is invalid.¹²

If the contract does not tend to cause a breach of trust the principle under discussion does not apply. Thus X may act as the agent of both adversary parties, if both know of such relation,¹³ and may receive compensation from both, even if neither knew that the other was to pay such agent.¹⁴ A contract whereby A, one of two partners, is to receive a commission of which A's partner knows and in which he shares, is not invalid because of a provision that such commission is to be kept secret.¹⁵ A contract between A and B whereby B is to use his personal influence with C is held invalid even though B is not C's agent.¹⁶

Contracts between stockholders with reference to the management and control of the corporation are valid if not designed to work a fraud on the other stockholders.¹ Stockholders who control a majority of the stock may unite to elect a board of directors and thus to control the corporation.² According to the weight of authority they may deposit their shares with the trustees, vesting in them the legal title and the power to vote.³ They may give proxies for voting their stock so that one person may vote the stock of several owners.⁴ Thus a contract between owners of a majority of stock whereby they were to vote solidly for such directors as they should previously have agreed upon in caucus was held valid.⁵ In many of the cases, however, the objection to the validity of the contract was made by minority stockholders.⁶ They are in no position to object to the performance of such a contract if the parties thereto are satisfied therewith. If, however, the parties to the contract, such as the real owner of the stock, become dissatisfied, a different question is presented. Voting trusts are held by some courts to be revocable at will.⁷ So are proxies, though by their terms made irrevocable.⁸ In other jurisdictions provisions that a proxy shall be irrevocable are enforced.⁹ So a contract to buy stock is valid though it is entered into with the intention of acquiring control of the corporation.¹⁰

At the same time the parties to contracts of this sort must deal fairly with the corporation and with the other stockholders. A contract to make private gain at the expense of the corporation is a fraud upon the corporation and the other stockholders.¹¹ Accordingly a contract between less than all the stockholders of a corporation for the election of one or more of the parties thereto to a lucrative office in the corporation is invalid.¹² Thus a contract by the directors and a majority of the stockholders with A, providing that if A will buy certain stock and act as manager of the corporation for a certain time

CONTRACTS TENDING TO INTERFERE WITH THE OPERATION OF THE GOVERNMENT.

§409. Contracts to defraud the government.

Contracts intended to operate as a fraud on the government are invalid.¹ Thus an assignment of a note and mortgage to avoid taxation,² or a contract between A and B whereby A presents fraudulent bills to a city council for B's services, and gets them allowed³ are all invalid. Thus a contract by which A, the owner of property destroyed by federal troops during the Civil War, agrees with B who has no interest in such property that B shall present such claim to the government in B's name as owner, and that A and B will divide whatever B recovers is unenforceable.⁴ Equity will give no relief in such cases. Thus where a village got authority from the Legislature to issue bonds by representing falsely that they were needed for internal improvements, equity will give no relief but will leave the parties to their remedies at law.⁵ A collusive suit between parties not really adverse in interest is a fraud on the court,⁶ amounts to contempt⁷ and will be dismissed by the court when such facts become apparent.⁸ Accordingly a contract between a county and a bidder for the bonds of such county by which the county is to pay the expenses of a feigned suit which the bidder is to cause to have brought to test the validity of the bonds and prosecuted to the supreme court of the state, and if the bonds are held valid the bidder is to take them at a fixed price is void.⁹ However, a contract by a private person whereby he agrees to release a surety on an official bond is not per se illegal; as it may be performed lawfully by paying to the state the amount of such surety's liability.¹⁰

§410. Contract to obtain public office.

A contract for obtaining the election or appointment of a person to an office in consideration of something of value is invalid.¹ Thus an attempted sale of a public office,² as where a promise by A, a sheriff, after election to appoint B as deputy and pay him half the net fees and salary is valid.⁷ An assignment of remuneration for official duties after it is earned is valid.⁸ This principle forbids assignment of the unearned compensation of a sheriff,⁹ a mail carrier,¹⁰ an assessor¹¹ and an executor.¹² The principle forbids the assignment of unearned fees¹³ as well as of unearned salary.¹⁴ The same principle has been held to forbid the assignment by a retired army officer of his unearned pay.¹⁵ On the other hand the assignment of the salary of a workhouse and infirmary chaplain is not void.¹⁶ A sale of a part of commissions to be earned, or of an allowance made to the jailer by a county for his services has been held valid.¹⁷ them to pay more² than the compensation fixed by law is not only without consideration³ but is void as being against public policy. This is especially true where the law imposes a penalty for exacting fees greater than the law allows.⁴ Thus a sheriff whose duty it is to arrest persons who bring stolen property into his county, cannot recover even on an express promise for arresting a thief who brings stolen money into such county.⁵ So a contract by a commissioner who is to be paid in fees, whereby he agrees not to charge fees unless the party at whose instance such costs were incurred recovers costs from the adversary party;⁶ or a contract whereby a sheriff agrees not to charge for serving writs unless the plaintiff is successful⁷ is invalid. A promise by a notary public to accept less than legal fees in consideration of his receiving all the paper of a given bank to be protested is unenforceable.⁸ However, where A agreed to act as clerk and notary for fifty dollars per month and the bank paid him this amount, it was held that he could not repudiate the contract and recover his fees, which were less than the amount paid to him.⁹ A promise by a candidate made to the electors before election to charge less than half the legal fees if elected is a form of bribery.¹⁰ But if the fled for preliminary trial before such justice,⁶ or a constable agrees not to levy an execution.⁷ To make such a contract illegal, it is not necessary that the officer bind himself to exercise his official power in any specific manner. It is sufficient if he is given a financial interest in acting in a certain manner which might be contrary to his official duty.⁸ So to make such contract illegal it is not necessary to show that the officer was corruptly influenced. The tendency of the contract to influence the official to the detriment of the public interest, and not the fact that he acts contrary to the public interest, is the element that makes the contract illegal.⁹ So a contract to refrain from exercising the duties of office,¹⁰ or a contract for transferring official duties to others, as independent contractors and not mere deputies,¹¹ is invalid. So a contract whereby a tax collector guarantees the collection of taxes and the town agrees that after such tax-collector has paid such taxes, the tax-warrants shall continue in force for his benefit until he has been reimbursed by the taxpayers, is invalid.¹² An agreement on valuable consideration to indemnify an officer for a past neglect is valid.¹³ An agreement to indemnify a public officer for the consequences of an act which he has reason to believe is not illegal, but as to the validity of which there is some doubt, is not illegal.¹⁴ If, hownance.¹⁶ Thus a promise by A to give his creditor B an extension of time if B would induce C, a county treasurer, to deposit public funds in A's bank¹⁷ is invalid. A contract to induce one to withdraw opposition to a bill is invalid.¹⁸ A contract to cause a legislative investigation of a corporation and thereby to depreciate the value of its stock is illegal.¹⁹ Some courts take a more lenient view of such contracts and hold that private solicitation does not make such a contract of employment illegal if neither personal influence nor improper means of persuasion are to be used.²⁰ Employment to explain a bill to individual members of the legislature has been held valid.²¹ Further, a contract requiring the agent to persuade the individual members of the legislature to act favorably on a given bill has been held valid if no unfair secret or dishonest means are to be used.²² An agreement by A to repay to B money advanced by B if the city council did not pass a certain resolution, is not necessarily invalid where it did not appear that A was to do anything to get such resolution passed;²³ and a contract to pay the expenses of an agent in getting certain criminal cases dismissed cannot be said as a matter of law to be illegal as contemplating bribery of the prosecuting attorney.²⁴ A contract to oppose the passage of an act confirming a land-grant as an avowed attorney has been held valid on the theory that such acts are "in effect judicial decisions."²⁵ The legislature of a state may provide for the appointment of a state agent to collect a claim from the United States and for paying him a fee contingent on his success, though he must procure legislation from Congress for the payment of such claim.²⁶ The legislative authority does away with any objection that such a contract is champertous. The question has been complicated by a Federal Statute providing that no part of certain claims shall be paid to any agent. The United States court holds that such statute makes a contract for such contingent fee invalid.²⁷ State courts have held that after the United States has paid the money over to the state, the former government has no power to prevent the latter from disposing of it as it pleases; and that it may employ and reimburse an agent.²⁸ Where a private individual employs an agent to collect a claim from the United States by the use of "diplomatic negotiations" among other means, such contract cannot be said as a matter of law to be illegal.²⁹ duties.¹ Thus if a railroad attempts by contract to bind itself to locate its depot in a given locality at a specified point and not to erect another depot in such locality, such contract is invalid, since the needs of the public alone should control the location of other depots.² So a covenant in a deed to the railroad company not to build a depot on the land conveyed is invalid.³ So a railroad cannot make a valid agreement not to build a side-track in a certain town;⁴ nor can a street-railway agree not to lay a second track without the consent of abutting property-owners, if such assent is not required by law.⁵ But if there is no restriction on the railroad company's locating other depots where it pleases, a contract to erect a depot at a specified place is valid;⁶ and a contract to construct a railroad upon a specified route is valid if the railroad company is free to build further if necessary.⁷ So contracts to establish a private switch,⁸ or to keep open a private crossing across a railroad,⁹ are valid. There seems some apparent divergence of authority on these last propositions.¹⁰ So a contract by which A agrees to convey half as much land to B as B is obliged to convey to a railroad company to induce it to locate a depot on such land, in consideration of B's agreeing to make such conveyance, is valid.¹¹ A contract whereby a railroad company agrees in consideration of a right of way to allow other railroads to make use of its right of way is, if not absolutely valid, at least a contract under which the railroad cannot take the right of way and refuse the use of it to other railroads.¹² Such a contract for joint use of a right of way is not avoided by the promise of the road to which such right of way is granted not to take freight to be transferred east of a specified place, or to be delivered to connecting lines at certain places.¹³ A contract whereby a railroad company agrees to give to a certain coal company the exclusive right to use a certain switch for hauling coal in consideration of permission by such coal company to permit such switch to be built in part over its land is void.¹⁴ A contract whereby a railroad agrees to operate solely in exclusive connection with a specific road, and in active competition with certain other roads, has been held not to be void as a matter of law. Its validity depends on whether such contract is reasonably calculated to serve public interests.¹⁵ A contract by a railroad company to retain an employee as long as he is able to do, and does do, faithful work, is valid and consistent with public policy.¹⁶

meanor.³ An agreement made between a prosecuting attorney and the attorney of the accused that if the judgment of conviction rendered on one indictment already tried is affirmed the accused shall plead guilty to three of the remaining indictments and the other nine shall be dismissed, is invalid.⁴ Contracts for preventing criminal prosecution are invalid though not made with a prosecuting witness or prosecuting attorney. A contract by an attorney to prevent an indictment of his client by the grand-jury,⁵ or a contract made with one not the prosecuting witness, whereby he agrees to obtain from the governor a nolle prosequi dismissing a criminal charge against a third party, or a contract between the accused and his attorney whereby the attorney agrees to induce the prosecuting attorney to enter a nolle, the accused to testify under the advice of his attorney,⁷ is invalid. So a contract with the surety company which was on the employment bond of a defaulter, whereby notes were given to the company by a third person to indemnify the company for the loss caused by the defalcation on consideration that such surety company would not cause prosecution of the defaulter is illegal.⁸ A contract to pay an attorney for defending one accused of crime then committed, and about to be tried, before a petit-jury is of course valid. But a contract to defend one against prosecution for crimes to be committed by him in the future is invalid.⁹

A contract whereby restitution is to be made to one whose property has been unlawfully appropriated or injured, is valid as long as the party to whom restitution is to be made does not agree to refrain from criminal prosecution of the offender.¹ Some cases go as far as to say that only an express agreement not to prosecute will make a contract of restitution illegal.² A mere threat to prosecute made before the contract of restitution is entered into is not conclusive that the contract involved an agreement not to prosecute;³ nor does a promise not to prosecute, made out of pity and after the contract of restitution was entered into, avoid such contract.⁴ But if a promise not to prosecute forms a part of the consideration of the contract of restitution, the whole contract is void.⁵

Rep. 288, it was held that while a promise to give a note with security in consideration of a promise to refrain from prosecution was invalid, a note with security given in pursuance of such contract was "not affected with the vice of the agreement."

If no crime has been committed by the accused, a promise by his friends to pay money to suppress criminal prosecution threatened by one who states that the accused has committed the crime charged is caused by duress or by fraud or by both. It would seem unnecessary to go further in ascertaining the facts, as such contracts can be attacked successfully by the promisor, either as illegal stifling of criminal prosecution on the one hand, or as caused by fraud or duress on the other.¹ While recognizing in general the accuracy of this view, the courts have placed their decisions on the ground that to make such a contract illegal, it is necessary as a ground of defense to the promisor only to show that the accused is charged with a crime;² or that as far as it affects the legality of the contract sought to be enforced against the promisor, a contract by which A employs B to effect the suppression of a criminal charge is an admission for the purpose of action on such contract that A is guilty.³ If part of the contract provides for suppressing a threatened criminal prosecution, the contract is not made legal by the fact that the accused was innocent.⁴ One who has by reason of such fraud or duress paid in money to avoid criminal prosecution of himself⁵ or another⁶ is said not to be guilty of compounding a

felony⁷ and hence not a party to the illegality. This reasoning is used to show that the party who has paid in money under such circumstances can recover it;⁸ but as the parties are not in pari delicto,⁹ such reasoning seems unnecessary even if correct. If the contract is one of restitution of property which has been converted by the accused to his own use, and it is sought to avoid such contract of restitution by showing that it is illegal as stifling criminal prosecution, some courts hold that it must appear either that a crime was in fact committed or that criminal proceedings were pending when such contract was made.¹⁰

§420. Contract to secure pardon.

A contract to represent a convict sentenced by a court of competent jurisdiction in applying for a pardon, as his avowed agent or attorney, without using improper means to obtain it, is valid.¹ A contract to obtain a pardon in any other way,² as by promising to pay money to the prosecuting witness to petition the court for a light sentence,³ or to petition the governor for a pardon,⁴ or a contract to withdraw opposition to granting a pardon for a pecuniary consideration,⁵ is invalid. Concealing the fact of employment to secure a pardon is improper.⁶ Working on a contingent fee is held improper by some courts;⁷

proper, by others.⁸ If one is under sentence imposed by a tribunal without jurisdiction a contract to obtain his release is not illegal. This is not a case of securing pardon but of obtaining release from unlawful imprisonment. Thus where a military court had, without having jurisdiction of the case, sentenced A to death, a contract by B to use his personal influence with the commanding general to secure a pardon or commutation of sentence for A is not illegal.⁹

A compromise of a civil action is valid.¹ The public has no interest in having such action instituted or prosecuted if the injured party is satisfied with the compensation made to him by the wrong-doer. The distinction between civil and criminal suits in this connection is one of real substance and not merely of outward form. Hence a suit for the protection of private rights which takes the outward form of a criminal action, such as a bastardy suit,² may be lawfully compromised and such a contract will be valid. On the other hand, the action may be in outward form one of a private nature, and yet the state may have such an interest therein that the parties are not free to contract as they please concerning the conduct of such action. An example of a contract of this sort is one concerning divorce.³

But if he employs persons to swear falsely, or to manufacture false evidence, such contracts of employment are illegal.⁵ For the same reason, a contract which gives persons a financial interest in testifying, or in furnishing testimony of a specific fact, tends to subornation of perjury and is illegal. In accordance with these principles a contract whereby A agrees to pay B to testify in A's behalf in litigation between A and another is illegal.⁶ Thus a contract to pay a party to an alleged fraud on another to testify in favor of such other in an action between him and other parties to such fraud, is void.⁷ So a contract to pay such witness if the party on whose behalf he is to testify is successful,⁸ or to give him a share of the proceeds,⁹ or to pay him more if the party for whom he testifies wins than if he loses,¹⁰ is void. nish evidence that will win the lawsuit,¹² is invalid. It does not aid such a contract that in the particular case there was, in fact, no perjury.¹³ This rule has been extended to include promises to pay a witness for his time and trouble.¹⁴ To the rule in this extreme form there are at least two exceptions. One exists where an expert witness is employed to make a special examination into the facts in controversy and testify with reference thereto.¹⁵ Thus a contract whereby A is to make a careful investigation of land values and to testify as a witness in a condemnation suit for a compensation, is valid.¹⁶ The other exists where a witness outside the jurisdiction of the court agrees for a recompense in value to attend at the trial and testify.¹⁷

Where the evidence is record evidence, the chance of fabricating which is very slight, a contract to furnish it for a share of the proceeds of the litigation has been held valid.¹⁸

A contract to disclose evidence may, of course, be invalid for entirely distinct and different reasons from those arising out of the supplying of evidence. Thus a contract by a city clerk to supply evidence to show that city ordinances imposing assessments are void, is illegal, as it tends to a breach of his official duty.¹⁹

¹⁹ Lucas v. Allen, 80 Ky. 681; citing Oscanyan v. Arms Co., 103 U. S. 262; Steele v. Curle, 4 Dana (Ky.) 381.

A contract whereby one party agrees to suppress certain evidence necessarily involves a wrong toward the person whose interest is affected thereby, if a civil matter, or the suppression of criminal prosecution, if a criminal matter, and in either case it is illegal.²⁰ Thus a promise to pay money on consideration that payee conceals the fact that payer has been guilty of adultery is void.²¹ So is a promise made by a legatee in consideration that the promisee will suppress evidence of the incapacity of testator and thus prevent the will from being set aside.²² The rule that a contract which tends to induce one to give false testimony is illegal is not restricted to litigation. A contract by one injured in a railroad accident with the attending physician that the latter should state to the railroad company the injuries of the former, and should receive three hundred dollars if fifteen hundred dollars was recovered, and five hundred dollars if two thousand dollars was recovered, is illegal.²³

CONTRACTS CONCERNING STATUS.

The law attaches certain definite consequences to each of the various forms of status. These consequences are not created by contract and have no connection with it. A few of them can be modified by contract; but most of them cannot. Of those which cannot be modified some are of such a nature that contracts whereby they are sought to be modified are merely void; while contracts which seek to modify other consequences of status are illegal. For these reasons contracts of this sort cannot be classed as all void or all illegal. A consideration of the various kinds of contract whereby it is sought to modify the consequences of status is necessary to determine the validity and effect of each.

A contract whereby a person who has never married binds himself not to marry,¹ or subjects himself to loss if he marries,² is invalid. The fact that the time for which the restraint is to last is limited does not make such contracts valid.³ A contract for "marriage benefit" insurance, which is a form of wager on the date of the marriage of the insured, is invalid.⁴

A contract restraining one who has once married not to marry a second time is held valid. Thus a promise to pay one's divorced wife a certain sum each month as long as she remains unmarried is valid.⁵ A promise to marry is valid and not illegal though it necessarily binds each party not to marry any one else under penalty of a damage suit.⁶ A contract in restraint of marriage is void but not illegal.⁷ Thus a contract by an uncle to provide for his niece by will if she would live with him and take care of him during his life, and not marry during that time, is valid in that if the niece performs her part of the contract she may have an action against her uncle or his estate for breach.⁸

A contract whereby A agrees to pay money to B if B will aid in influencing or inducing C to marry A is known as a marriage brokerage contract, and is invalid,¹ even if when A makes his promise to B, C has agreed to marry A.² Thus a contract whereby A agrees to pay money to B if B will introduce him to C and C will marry A is void.³ This principle has been so applied as to make invalid a contract designed to hasten an intended marriage.⁴ Thus a mortgage given by A to B condi-

The mutual rights and liabilities of husband and wife are fixed by law. The preservation of this status and the mutual duties attendant thereon is one of the cherished objects of the law. Any contract between them whereby they attempt to modify their personal duties to each other and yet leave their relationship subsisting is contrary to public policy and void.¹ The husband is bound to support his wife if he is able. Hence a contract whereby a wife agrees for value to support her husband is void.² Personal services rendered by the wife to the husband do not and cannot impose liability upon him. Thus a contract by a husband to pay his wife for her services as a housekeeper is void.³ A contract between husband and wife to assist in caring for and supporting each other, any surplus over living expenses to be the property of the wife, is contrary to public policy.⁴ In cases of this sort the objection to the validity of the contract is generally made not by the parties thereto but by the creditors of the husband. A contract whereby a husband agrees to live in a specified state, and not to remove therefrom

The custody of a minor child is of concern to both the child and the state, and not merely a private property right of its parents. In all questions of the right of custody of a minor child, the welfare of the child is of paramount importance. Accordingly, considered solely as a contract, the general rule is that a contract whereby a parent disposes of his right to the custody of the child and the adversary party assumes sole liability for its support is void as contrary to public policy,¹ unless such contracts are made in accordance with the provisions of a statute.² Accordingly the parent may repudiate the contract and regain possession of the child at any time,³ provided that he is a fit person to have control.⁴ If the contract is performed by a change of custody of the child, and ties of affection bind the child to its custodian, the courts may refuse to allow the parents to recover the custody of the child, if plainly not for its interests.⁵ But this does not rest on the binding force of the original contract, but solely on the fact that a change from the custody and surroundings in which the child has been placed voluntarily by his parents would be injurious to his interests, which must first be considered.⁶

But if it does not appear that the child is so fond of its custodian that separation will be detrimental⁷ the contract will be ignored and the parent given custody of his child. There are, however, some cases in which it is held that such contracts are "not against public policy, because of the special facts and on the ground that the contract was for the welfare of the child."⁸ This view makes the contract valid except when the welfare of the child demands that the contract be disregarded.⁹ Thus where A agreed with his son's divorced wife that he would pay her a certain sum and pay her son a certain sum when he came of age if she would allow A to have the custody of her son, A's grandson, till he came of age, and she surrendered such child to

A under such contract, the contract was held valid, and A's estate liable to the mother for the money to be paid to her.¹⁰ A contract between husband and wife who have separated, concerning the custody of the children, has been held valid, subject to the power of the divorce court to adjudge the custody of the child as it may deem best for the interests of the children.¹¹ So a contract by which the mother surrenders the custody of her illegitimate child is valid.¹² So the surrender of the custody of a child under contract is a good consideration for a promise to make a will,¹³ even if the promise not to leave it in the custody to which it is given for a certain time is void.¹⁴

A contract for the custody of an adult child is of course void, as the parents have no right to his custody and no power of restraint.¹⁵ Thus a contract whereby a divorced wife to whose custody the minor daughter has been awarded agrees with her former husband that he may have the custody of such daughter until she comes of age, and then he will return her to the wife, is void as to the latter provision.¹⁶ The divergence of authority in the decisions as distinguished from dicta is not as great as would at first appear. No case is found even in jurisdictions holding such contracts void where considerations of the welfare of the child may not cause the court to adjudge its custody to the same person as that indicated by the contract. So even in jurisdictions treating such contracts as valid, the person to whom the custody of the child has been given by contract is not allowed to retain such custody if not for the best interests of the child. Furthermore, the cases in which the custody of the child is awarded according to the terms of the contract are those in which the custody of the child has actually been transferred and on account of the affection of the child for its custodians the best interests of the child demand that it be left where it is. On similar facts, therefore, the courts usually reach the same result, under either of the opposing theories. The chief divergence in actual decision must therefore exist where the parent and the person to whom the custody has been transferred are equally suitable persons to have the custody of the child. Such cases are naturally rather uncommon. It may, indeed, be questioned whether the contract, apart from change of custody, is ever looked upon as valid; that is, if the contract were entirely executory whether the custody of the child would be given to the party to whom it had been promised; or whether damages could be recovered for breach. A third person, who abducts a child, cannot attack the validity of the contract under which the custody of such child has been transferred.¹⁷

A contract between husband and wife which contemplates, and tends to promote, their future separation is invalid.¹ So a conveyance of the homestead by the husband to the wife, the wife to have the power to exclude the husband therefrom at her pleasure on paying him an annuity for life is void.² A contract which does not promote future separation is valid, although it provides therefor. Thus a contract whereby a married woman agreed that money due her should be paid on her death to her heirs unless her husband should die or she should separate from him and become dependent on herself for support was held valid.³ So a contract between A, B's father, and C, whom B had seduced, that if C married B, A would support C and her child and provide a home for them if B did not, was held valid.⁴

The attitude of the courts towards contracts for immediate separation has been characterized by much vacillation and confusion.⁵ The original English rule held by the ecclesiastical courts was that such contracts were void. Question concerning marriage came before the ecclesiastical courts up to their abolition in 1857.⁶ Subsequently by "one of the most marvelous judicial somersaults ever witnessed in any country" the English courts, observing that "public opinion has altered,"⁸ reversed their earlier rulings and upheld such contracts.⁹ For a short period, it seemed as if the later authorities would be overruled and the earlier ones followed.¹⁰ But the reactionary tendency soon passed away and such contracts were held valid,¹¹ and were specifically enforced in equity.¹² In the United States

some courts have followed the rule of the English ecclesiastical courts in holding such contracts illegal.¹³ The covenant for separation is unenforceable,¹⁴ and a contract whereby the husband agrees to make no demand on his wife's property in view of their separation does not prevent him from taking a share of her estate after her death.¹⁵ So in a contract for immediate separation whereby the husband agreed to support his wife and children and to assign certain insurance policies to her, but such assignment was not made so as to prevent the husband from changing the beneficiary of the policy thereafter; and the wife learned of this form of the assignment after she had paid a loan for which the policy was pledged as collateral, and sued for reformation, relief was refused.¹⁶ The validity of any part of such contract depends on the question of the validity of separate covenants in an illegal contract not dependent on the illegal part.¹⁷ In other jurisdictions such contracts seem to be held to be valid,¹⁸ and covenants depending on the covenant to live separate seem to be upheld.¹⁹ Thus a covenant to renounce all interest in the estate of the husband in consideration of separation and support is held valid.²⁰ But such a contract, while treated as valid, has been held not to prevent the wife from inheriting under the statute from the husband where he dies without lineal descendants, and intestate, as such contract merely gives the husband "the full dominion of his property" while he lived, and did not specifically refer to any rights of inheritance.²¹ A separation contract fixing the amount of maintenance does not contain an implied covenant not to ask for a larger amount of alimony if a divorce is thereafter sought for subsequent misconduct.²² A contract during separation whereby a husband agrees to relinquish all dower in his wife's lands and

Whether separation contracts are legal or illegal, a contract between husband and wife who have separated or are about to separate immediately, whereby the husband provides for the support of his wife and children²⁴ or for a division of their property,²⁵ is valid.

Where separation contracts are legal, a contract for support is of course legal, the husband's liability to support his wife and family forming ample consideration. provisions of the contract.²⁶ A contract for reconciliation and cohabitation is valid,²⁷ even if coupled with a condition of reformation on the part of the delinquent spouse, a breach whereof is to end the contract of reconciliation.²⁸ Any contract whether between husband and wife or between either and a third person which tends to prevent a reconciliation is invalid.²⁹ Thus a contract by a married woman to give her attorney in the divorce suit one-half of the alimony awarded her tends to give such attorney an interest in preventing a reconciliation and is invalid.³⁰

While the law permits divorce in specified cases, it does not encourage it. Further, the state has an interest in every marriage contract, and is often said to be a third party thereto.¹ Hence, where husband and wife may make contracts with each other,² a contract based on their obtaining a divorce thereafter is void as contra bonos mores.³ The fact that the contract is intended to facilitate divorce is enough to make it illegal.⁴ Thus

However, a contract of separation, otherwise valid, is not invalid because the parties thereto hope to obtain a divorce in a short time.⁹ Where A is married to B, a contract between A and C whereby A agrees to divorce B and marry C is illegal, and A's promise to marry C,¹⁰ or to pay money,¹¹ or to deed property to her¹² are all invalid. If part of the contract is that no resistance is to be made to the remaining grounds of divorce, the illegality of such contracts is clear; and perhaps this is a term, implied at least, in most contracts of this sort. But in the absence of such understanding it is hard to see why withdrawing one ground of divorce is illegal, when it is legal to withdraw all. (See this section.) In Irvin v. Irvin, 169 Pa. St. 529; 29 L. R. A. 292; 32 Atl. 445, such a contract seems to have been held valid. A contract to refrain from bringing a divorce suit,¹⁷ or to dismiss one already brought,¹⁸ is valid. Whether such agreement to refrain from bringing a divorce suit or to dismiss one already brought is a consideration for a promise based thereon is a question discussed elsewhere.¹⁹ valid as tending to promote separation,² the cases in which such contracts have been held invalid are those in which there is some additional provision encouraging future separation or divorce.³ However a contract to pay to promisor's wife a certain sum of money if a divorce was granted without alimony has been held illegal as tending to facilitate divorce.⁴ Whether such contract can bind the action of the court if it is sought to obtain a judgment for alimony upon the basis of the contract is doubtful.⁵ The court is not bound by such contract as to community property and may ignore it even if no suit has been brought to set it aside.⁶ A contract for separation and maintenance does not, at least if broken, oust the court of chancery of its jurisdiction to allow alimony.⁷ The court usually enters judgment upon the basis of such agreement, if just and reasonable,⁸ and the adjudicated cases usually arise either on such a state of facts, or else where the parties to the

MONOPOLY CONTRACTS.

Monopolies have always been held to be "against the Common Law"¹ whether granted by the sovereign power or created by contract between private citizens; and modern Common Law, aided and supplemented by statutes, refuses to enforce contracts which tend to create monopolies on the ground that they are detrimental to the public interest.² This rule of law has proved partially ineffectual to prevent monopoly contracts. Since, from its nature, it can be applied only in an action between the parties to a monopoly contract, it follows that if the monopoly is so complete and the profits arising therefrom are so large that the parties thereto are satisfied, the Common Law rule made it impossible for any other private person to complain. Statutes have been passed by the United States and by some of the states giving to the government,³ or to third persons injured by the operation of the monopoly,⁴ the right to complain of such monopoly and to invoke judicial action. Cases decided under these statutes are of value as far as they show what a monopoly is. As far as concerns the power of the state to punish offenders under such statutes, these cases have no connection with the law of contracts and questions of this sort will not be here discussed.

Whether a contract tends to create a monopoly is a question not always easy to answer. It is said to be a mixed question of law and fact, proper for the jury.¹ Unless there is some tendency to a monopoly the contract should not be held invalid. An agreement between a number of stevedores cannot be held unlawful where it is not shown how many stevedores are members of the association as compared with the whole number in the city.² If there is no attempt or tendency to a monopoly it is always lawful to buy the plant, equipment and good-will of a competitor.³ On the other hand monopoly contracts are invalid, although they may not succeed in establishing an absolutely perfect monopoly, as it is their tendency rather than their ultimate effect that the law reproves.⁴ Further, by the weight of authority a contract which creates such a monopoly as to put it into the power of such combination to raise prices, is invalid,⁵ though the price may not in fact have been raised,⁶ or may even have been lowered.⁷ But some courts hold that a combination which does not increase prices beyond a reasonable price is valid.⁸

No exhaustive classification can be made of the forms of contracts which tend to monopoly. As given forms of such contracts are declared invalid, new ones are devised by the ingenuity of those who wish to make such contracts, and the only final limit to their form will be the limits to the writ of man. In these, as in gambling contracts, the parties thereto knowing that in their true form they are invalid, seek to make use of language to conceal their thought and to hide rather than to express their real intention. A few of the most important classes of such contracts are given by way of example.

(a) Buying Off Competition.—Where without a sale of good-will, or other legitimate dealing therewith, one party agrees with the other to abstain from business, such contract is invalid without regard to its reasonableness as to either space or time.¹ Such contracts are equally invalid whether the competition is suppressed directly or indirectly. Thus a contract is invalid whereby A is to sell lumber to B for eleven dollars a thousand, and to pay B twenty dollars a thousand for all lumber sold by him to other persons.²

(b) In the absence of a sale of good-will, a contract limiting competition by dividing trade area or customers between the parties, and agreeing not to compete in such areas or to deal with such persons designated as customers of the other, is invalid.¹ Examples of such contracts are as follows: between contract to create an exclusive agency or to sell to one vendee only is in pursuance of a plan to create a monopoly, it is unquestionably invalid.⁷ An agreement between two competing firms of grain dealers to buy grain at a given place on joint account is not necessarily a monopoly contract.⁸

of commodities (Sayles's Ann. Civ. Stat. 1897, Art. 5313), a contract whereby a wholesale dealer or manufacturer agrees to sell to one person only in a given locality and such person agrees to buy only from such wholesaler, is void, though it may be called a contract of agency. *Texas Brewing Co. v. discriminate in prices between members and non-members, control the production or distribution in that locality of the article in which they deal and provide for fines, expulsion and boycott for breach of such contract are invalid.² Such an association violates the United States anti-trust act of 1890.³ So under statutes which prohibit combinations to fix prices, a contract between insurance companies or their agents for maintaining rates,⁴ or fixing the compensation of their employees,⁵ is invalid, even though such organization masquerades as a social club of insurance agents.⁶ However a contract between a dealer and customer who is a retailer, fixing the price of certain articles has been held valid.⁷ However, a contract between two connecting and non-competing water companies, whereby they fix rates to be charged to the public residing in a given city has been held not to be monopolistic where by the state constitution the municipal corporation possesses the power to regulate water rates.⁸

their actual output at some fixed time, which common fund is to be divided among them in some fixed proportion, restrain free competition, since when the market price is not far above the cost of production, it will be more profitable to refuse orders than it will be to fill them and pay the required amount into the pool.¹ Railroad pools are often on this objectionable plan.² A modification of this type of contract exists where the parties to the contract, formerly competitors in business, settle among themselves who shall sell goods to do work for parties outside the contract, as by bidding to see who will pay the highest bonus into the pool for doing the work,³ or bidding to see who would do the work for the least money and then adding a certain sum thereto, which is paid by the party for whom the work is done and goes into the pool.⁴ Such modifications are as illegal as the general type of monopoly contract. held valid though they may limit competition. A consolidation of competitors, if made as part of a bona fide compromise of litigation over disputed rights, is not invalid.¹ An agreement between the merchants of a town to close at a fixed time,² or for protection against dishonest customers³ is valid. A contract to pay the owner of a grist-mill a certain sum per day for each day that the water is obstructed is valid where intended to adjust damages and not to stifle competition.⁴ A contract whereby a wholesale dealer, to increase his trade, promises to pay a rebate to such customers as would buy of him exclusively for a certain time, is held valid.⁵ Such a contract is valid where the price at which vendee is to retail goods is fixed, vendee being free to change his scale of prices or to buy elsewhere if willing to lose the rebate.⁶ At any rate the vendee cannot recover the rebate after buying goods elsewhere.⁷ So if in the competition of business, as merely incidental thereto, certain business is placed at a relative disadvantage, no monopoly can be said to exist.⁸ So a contract whereby A agrees to sell to B at a lower price than C has sold, to enable B to compete successfully is valid even if C is a monopoly.⁹

Furthermore the owner of private property of which others have no right to make use without his consent, may give exclusive rights in such property, and his agreement to that effect will not be invalid as creating a monopoly.¹ Thus the owner

Some courts have endeavored to distinguish between articles of prime necessity and those not of prime necessity, holding that monopoly contracts are invalid if the article affected is one of prime necessity; otherwise not. Such a rule "only furnishes another opportunity for a court to give effect to the varying economical opinions of its different members,"¹ and it is often impossible to determine whether the court, in holding a monopoly contract invalid, does so because the article in question is one of prime necessity or because they hold such contracts invalid without reference to the nature of the article. Among the articles which have been treated as articles of prime necessity under this rule are live-stock,² flour,³ grain,⁴ bags for transporting grain,⁵ butter,⁶ milk,⁷ preserves,⁸ ice,⁹ oil,¹⁰ gas,¹¹ can-this doctrine obtains, cigarettes,²⁹ window-shade rollers,³⁰ glue³¹ and sanitary pottery³² are held not to be articles of prime necessity, and hence liable to be the subjects of valid monopoly contracts. The better rule seems to be that no monopoly contract is valid in any article of merchandise, at least if in general use, whether of prime necessity or not. Under this rule, blue-stone for curbing,³³ envelopes,³⁴ dynamite,³⁵ glucose,³⁶ beer,³⁷ and distillery products³⁸ are articles of such general use that monopoly contracts therein are not permitted. Where an anti-trust law forbids combinations in general, it makes no difference whether the article in question is one of prime necessity or not.³⁹ But if the statute forbids monopolies of property, it has no application to monopolies of services and labor.⁴⁰

A trade secret is recognized by the law as property,¹ and a promise by one to whom such secrets are imparted restraining him from divulging or using them is valid though unlimited as to time and space;² or a contract fixing the area within which the secret can be used, and the price at which the article produced thereby can be sold is valid.³ So a contract with one to be employed to improve the machinery of another, providing that the employer shall have the benefit of all patents for inventions made by such employee during his term of employment and that if any inventions are not patented, the employee will keep such information a secret forever, has been held to be valid.⁴ Such contract is neither unconscionable nor contrary to public policy.

sell the same and agree not to make use thereof without restriction as to time or area.⁸ A contract which tends to create a monopoly in the sale of books, some copyrighted and some not copyrighted, is illegal, even if it would have been valid had it been limited to copyrighted books.⁹

Public corporations may be and often are authorized to grant monopolies in services of a public nature. Thus under the Police Power monopolies may be granted, as for the collection of garbage,¹ for conducting the business of slaughtering within city limits,² for the sale of school-books throughout the state, to be let to the lowest bidder³ or for the sale of intoxicating liquor.⁴ So monopolies may be created in matters not of public right, since only the government can permit such business at all, and it can therefore give such permission to such persons and on such terms and restrictions as it pleases. Thus turnpikes,⁵ toll-bridges,⁶ water-works⁷ and the like may be made monopolies.

The power which assumes to create the monopoly must be authorized so to do in order to create a valid monopoly. A municipality cannot create a monopoly without authority from the legislature,⁸ and the legislature may be prevented from authorizing a monopoly by constitutional provisions.⁹

While not strictly a form of monopoly contract, a contract by which a corporation which owes duties to the public agrees not to perform such duties, is generally a part of a monopoly scheme, and may be considered in connection with monopoly contracts.

If a corporation owes certain duties to the public, a contract whereby it agrees not to perform them is not only ultra vires,¹ but is also illegal, without reference to whether the restraint is reasonable as to time or space.² Thus contracts which tend to disable a common carrier from performing its duties to the public at reasonable rates are invalid; as contracts to maintain certain rates;³ even if the rates actually established are reasonable and the combination is made to prevent ruinous competition.⁴ If the carrier discharges its duty to the public it may

So contracts whereby the parties limit the services which they will render to third parties, are especially invalid where the promisor is a corporation charged with duties to the public which it agrees not to perform within certain areas or as to certain customers.⁷ Thus a railroad company cannot give a monopoly of the express business,⁸ nor acquire a controlling interest in a competing railroad.⁹ Contracts between competing street railway companies by which they apportion between them the territory of the municipality from which they have their franchise, agreeing not to compete therein, as by agreeing not to cross each other's tracks except in a specified way which is not allowed by law,¹⁰ or by agreeing not to compete in obtaining a franchise, but to divide the profits thereof,¹¹ are invalid. A company which has a franchise for furnishing gas to the public, with the right to lay pipes in the streets, cannot agree to renounce its obligation to furnish gas.¹⁴ This includes a purchase by one corporation of the stock in all the competing gas companies in a city,¹⁵ as well as a contract between two competing gas companies, fixing prices and agreeing not to furnish gas to the other's customers.¹⁶ Telegraph and telephone companies are also quasi-public corporations, which may be and often are endowed with the power of eminent domain. CHAPTER XXVI.

WAGER CONTRACTS.

A wager contract is one in which the parties arbitrarily select some event, and create a financial interest in its outcome or ascertainment by agreeing that in case of the one result thereof, A will give to B a thing of value, while in the other event B will give A something of value.¹ As the element of risk is present in all executory transactions and many executed ones, risk alone does not make the contract a wager.² A sale of an article in excess of its real value payable on the happening or

² Examples of contracts which are not wagers. Hanna v. Ingram, 93 Ala. 482; 9 So. 621. (A sale of an interest in an option on land, the assignee to receive his share of the profits on a resale.) Vigel v. Gattton, 61 Ill. App. 98. (A resale at a loss of a lot of hogs already shipped.) Connell v. Hudson, 53 Mo. App. 418. (A resale to vendor of a steer accidentally left in his possession, on consideration that he pay the vendees whatever loss they may suffer on their venture.) Clyde v. Mohn, 4 Onio C. C. 537. (A sold land to B for $700 in cash and $2,000 payable in fourteen years, with annual interest; but if A should die before the end of fourteen years B to be released from paying the $2,000.) Tontine insurance is not gambling. Rothschild v. Ins. Co., 97 Ill. App. 547.

determination of a certain event arbitrarily selected by the parties is a wager.³ A guaranty of the market price of cattle by A, under an agreement that A shall pay to B any deficiency under the price fixed and shall receive from B any excess over such price is a wager.⁴ So where A allows B and C to use A's billiard table to be paid for by the winner, the transaction is a wager.⁵ However, if the event is one which affects the value of the thing sold, as that the horse sold should trot a mile in a specified time,⁶ or should win a race,⁷ it is not a wager. A guaranty by the vendor of stock that it will bring a certain price in two years, with a promise to buy it back then at that price if vendee then "holds such stock and so requests," is not a wager.⁸ So a contract for the sale of the produce of certain orange trees for two years in advance possesses many elements of uncertainty but is not a wager.⁹ The essential feature of wager contracts is that the party who loses receives nothing in possession and has not even the promise of anything in return for his loss. Wager contracts, then, really lack the element of consideration,¹⁰ though few courts have ever treated them on that theory. This last proposition in turn needs some explanation. It is possible for the parties to a wager to stake not the entire value of a certain thing but a fraction of its value.¹¹ With a bet of this sort it is often hard to see that there is no consideration, but there is none for whatever the parties have agreed to stake on the event. If any part of the value is to be won or lost on the extrinsic event the contract is a wager.

If the courts had taken the position at the outset that gambling or wager contracts lacked consideration, much trouble might have been spared. Ordinary wagers could have been treated as merely void. As it was, the English courts committed themselves to the doctrine that such contracts were valid, if they did not tend to breach of the peace, or to injure third persons or the government.¹ Their desire to escape from this doctrine without overruling it, led to the counter doctrine that certain classes of wagers were not actionable on special grounds of public policy, such as wagers which might cause annoyance to third persons,² or might injure the government,³ or that vague and elastic class known as wagers contrary to public policy.⁴ In the United States, while some courts at first upheld the validity of wager contracts in adherence to English precedent,⁵ others refused to do so; and with the spread of the latter doctrine and the enactment of statutes making gambling and wager contracts void or illegal it may be said as a general proposition that gambling contracts are either void or illegal everywhere, in the United States and in England.⁶ The legislature has power to declare wagers and gambling illegal, and may make it unlawful and criminal to bet on a race in another state.⁷

Modern statutes have practically made all gambling and wager contracts invalid. Simple undisguised bets, wagers and gaming are so clearly made invalid by these statutes that few questions now ever arise concerning their validity. Betting on a game, as betting on a billiard-match,¹ on throwing dice,² on a game of poker,³ or an election,⁴ or on a horse-race,⁵ and a contract that one action shall be decided as another one,⁶ are all invalid. A bet is none the less invalid because it is not made a crime.⁷ The only exceptions to the rule that wagers are invalid exist in those states which hold that such contracts are valid at Common Law and in which the legislature has made such contracts invalid not by a general statute, but by enumerating the special kinds of gambling contracts which it made void. If any classes were omitted from this enumeration, deliberately or accidentally, such contracts are there held valid.⁸ Since these statutes, the law of wager contracts chiefly assumes the form of constant attempts by parties to disguise the fact that they are gambling, and constant failures to accomplish such result.

§451. Gambling.

Gambling is a form of wagering, in which the stake is on the result of some game.¹ In many cases, as in actions between the parties, where the contract is equally invalid whether gambling, or merely a wager, the terms may be used interchangeably without thereby causing reversible error.² But statutes often separate gambling contracts from other wagers. Thus a note for a wager may be valid in the hands of a bona fide holder, while one for gambling is not.³ Thus under the English gaming act of 1845 no recovery could be had for securities deposited to abide the result of a gaming contract, while recovery can be had if it is a wager on future differences.⁴ Where the statute makes a difference in legal effect between a wager and gambling, contracts of wager on future differences,⁵ and election bets,⁶ are wagers, not gambling.

A lottery is a scheme for "procuring, through lot or chance, by the investment of money or something of value some greater amount of money, or thing of value."¹ It follows from this definition that a distribution by lot of things of unequal value among persons who invest the same amount is a lottery, even though under the scheme every person who purchases a chance is to receive something.² Thus a scheme to distribute by lot tracts of land of unequal value among a number of persons, each of whom is to pay the same price for the land, is a lottery.³ Thus, where the right to select a certain number passes with each sale of a lead-pencil and prizes are to be distributed by lot among the holders of such numbers a lottery exists.⁴ So the operation of a slot machine has been held to be a lottery though something of value was drawn every time, because the things drawn were of different values and chance determined what each player would receive.⁵ A scheme for issuing bonds and redeeming them in an order determined by lot, thereby paying some holder the face value thereof in a short time and for a small payment while others are postponed for a much longer time and are bound to pay much more, is a lottery.⁶ But a contract whereby A is to pay one dollar and twenty-five cents a week to B for sixty-three weeks, and B is then to deliver to A a diamond and if A wishes, B is to buy it for one hundred and twenty dollars, A forfeiting all interest in payments made if he does not keep them up has been held not a gambling contract.⁷ A plan of distribution, originally lawful, may by the adoption of a scheme of chance become a lottery.⁸ A distribution by lot among co-owners of things substantially equal in value is not a lottery, as where a number of lots were bought together, the lots to be sold to the shareholders at auction as long as there was any choice between them, and when there was none to be divided among the owners by lot.⁹ Offering gifts with each sale, where such gifts are substantially of equal value, is not a lottery,¹⁰ nor is it a lottery where tickets to a drawing are distributed gratuitously.¹¹ A lottery cannot exist where there is no element of chance or luck. Thus where A sold all the tickets in a so-called lottery for A's house to B, it was held that no lottery existed.¹² So giving "trading stamps" with each sale is not a lottery and a statute forbidding such a gift is unconstitutional.¹³

A form of wager often difficult to detect exists where an apparent contract of sale is made for future delivery, in which the parties do not intend delivery of the thing contracted for, but mean to settle the contract by paying and receiving the difference between the market price and the price agreed upon.

to be void at Common Law² on grounds of public policy.³ Where wager contracts are invalid no specific statute is necessary to make this class of contracts invalid.⁴ The absence of the intention of the parties at the inception of the contract to deliver and pay for the goods sold respectively, determines the contract to be a wager. It is not necessary that there should be a positive intention not to deliver the goods sold, to make the contract a wager, as distinguished from the absence of an intention to deliver. If the contract does not require delivery, though it allows delivery as an alternative provision at the election of either party, it is a wager.⁵ To make a future sale a wager the intention to settle differences must be entertained by both parties to the transaction, and such intention of one party alone will not invalidate the contract.⁶ Accordingly a contract whereby the vendee represents that he intends performance and, to relieve vendor from the trouble of proving such intent, agrees to indemnify him from such damage as vendor may sustain by reason of non-existence of such intent, is void as a mere attempt to evade the statute.⁷ Such intent of one party is, however, admissible in evidence as a link in the chain showing the real contract.⁸ The intention to assign one's rights under a future contract of sale, before delivery,⁹ or an actual re-sale,¹⁰ or hope that the adversary party will settle differences,¹¹ do not make the contract a wager. A contract for future delivery may be valid, if real delivery is intended when the contract is made,¹² even if the vendor has not the property sold on hand and must buy it to perform the contract;¹³ or if the property is bought as a mere speculation,¹⁴ or is not in existence when the contract is made.¹⁵ Some statutes forbid "future" sales.¹⁶ Under such statute a rapid succession of purchases and sales for present delivery is not invalid.¹⁷ So a sale on margins, the vendee depositing only so much of the purchase price as will secure the vendor or broker against loss in case of a fall in prices, is not necessarily a wager contract;¹⁸ and if the parties intend delivery when the contract is formed, the fact that they subsequently agree to discharge the contract by settling differences does not make it a wager.¹⁹ The converse of this proposition is not always held true. A transaction originally merely a wager contract may be made valid by treating the last transaction as a purchase.²⁰ That the sales were on margin,²¹ may be evidence from which it may be inferred that the parties intended at the outset merely to settle differences, especially where the vendor knows that the vendee is not able financially to pay the entire purchase price.²² That the sales were actually settled by paying differences²³ is not of itself conclusive that the contracts were wagers at their inception. Contracts which give either vendor²⁴ or vendee an option as to the time of delivery within certain limits are prima facie valid.²⁵ Some statutes forbid "option" contracts. This statute as construed by the lower courts of Illinois forbade practically all executory contracts in which any election was given to either party.²⁶ But the courts of last resort held that "option" as used in the statute meant a "put"—the privilege of delivering or not delivering the thing sold—or a "call"—the privilege of calling or not calling for the thing bought; that is, it meant future wager sales.²⁷ Other options are valid,²⁸ as a contract

Whether offering prizes for success in competitions is gambling or not is often a question of some difficulty as the real transaction is often so disguised as to be difficult to understand. If the amount of the prize depends in whole or in part¹ upon the amount of the entrance fees, it is a wager contract, closely resembling a lottery, except that skill or strength, not chance, is supposed to determine the winner of the prize. If the prize does not depend on entrance fees,² as where it consists of the voluntary subscriptions of persons who take no part in the contest³ it is not gambling. In some states statutes have forbidden offering prizes for certain kinds of contests.⁴ Such statute does not apply to a promise to pay a certain sum to the owner of a stallion if a foal out of the mare of the promisor by the stallion of the promisee is the first foal by such stallion to trot a mile in a specified time.⁵

645. "It will not do to attach too much weight or importance to the mere form of the instrument, for it is quite certain that parties will be astute in concealing their intention, and the real nature of the transaction if it be illegal." Barnard v. Backhaus, 52 Wis. 593, 600; 6 N. W. 252; 9 N. W. 595.

CHAPTER XXVII.

SUNDAY CONTRACTS.

At Common Law an act might be done as lawfully on Sunday as on any other day,¹ except judicial acts² or such acts as by reason of the manner in which they were done amounted to nuisances. Contracts made on Sunday were therefore valid at Common Law,³ as were contracts to be performed on Sunday.⁴

Modern statutes differing in different jurisdictions have forbidden certain acts to be done on Sunday, and have made a violation of such statutes a crime. In considering the effect of such statutes on contracts a distinction must be made between (a) contracts made on Sunday and (b) contracts which by their terms must be performed on Sunday. Under some of these statutes, contracts made on Sunday are void.¹ Thus, delivery on Sunday of a note,² or a note and mortgage,³ making a loan,⁴ a lease,⁵ a contract of employment,⁶ a contract of sale,⁷ or a release of damages,⁸ are all void.

What form of prohibition in such statutes is necessary to include contracts is a question on which there is some diversity of judicial opinion. Statutes which forbid "secular business,"¹ "secular labor, business or employment,"² "work, labor or busi-

"labor" or "common labor" does not include making ordinary contracts.¹⁶ Other statutes forbidding work and labor of certain specified kinds are held not to avoid contracts made on Sunday which do not grow out of acts of a prohibited class.¹⁷ A statute which prohibits "public selling and offering for sale" does not avoid private sales.¹⁸

§458. What constitutes a Sunday contract.

A contract,¹ as a note,² bond,³ or deed,⁴ written and signed on Sunday but not delivered till a week day is not a Sunday contract. So a contract is not a Sunday contract where oral negotiations are completed on Sunday and the contract is written, executed or delivered on a week day,⁵ or where an offer is made on Sunday and accepted on a week day,⁶ as where repre-

or to perform in a theatre on Sunday,⁴ or under a statute imposing a fine on "labor, business or work" on Sunday, on a contract to publish a paper on week days and Sundays, and to print advertisements therein.⁵ But under a statute providing that convicts shall not be required to work on Sundays and holidays, recovery can be had on a contract by a convict to work on such days, such statute being for the protection of the convict.⁶ If the contract does not by its terms require forbidden acts to be done on Sunday it is not illegal, though one party may intend to do one or more of such acts on Sunday.⁷ Thus a contract to furnish a car for cattle is valid, though the shipper means to sell on Sunday,⁸ and a contract of employment which does not require working or traveling on Sunday is valid, though it recites that the train leaves at a certain hour on Sunday,⁹ or though the compensation is to be at a fixed rate per day for the time spent on a trip, "Sundays and all."¹⁰ A contract of sale made on a week day is not made invalid because delivery is made on Sunday at the request of the vendee.¹¹ A statute making common labor or sporting on Sunday a crime does not make illegal a contract for a theatrical performance on Sunday.¹²

I. HISTORY AND NATURE OF USURY.

§441. History of usury in English Law.

At the early Common Law, usury is constantly spoken of as a thing forbidden to Christians, and as a sin.¹ An investigation, however, of the use of the term shows us that usury included all taking of interest for a loan of money, no matter what the rate. Usury, meaning loaning money at interest, was permitted to the Jews until shortly before their expulsion from England.² The rules against usury had the actual effect, therefore, of making the right to take interest a matter of royal license, and ultimately in part, a right to be exercised for the benefit of the king, since the right to take interest was given to the Jew alone; and "the Jew can have nothing that is his own, for whatever he acquires, he acquires not for himself but for the king."³ It was in fact, a royal monopoly, made possible by religious prejudice and intolerance, and productive of results very different from those apparent to the mass of the community. In Glanville's time the offense reprobated by the courts seems to have been not the taking of usury, but "dying in usury," that is, dying while usurious transactions were entered upon but were still executory. Dying in usury caused a forfeiture of chattels to the king, while the land reverted to the lord of whom it was held.⁴ However, "if any one has, during a certain period of his life, been guilty of this crime and be publicly accused of it in the community where he lived, if he desisted from his error before his death and was penitent, neither he nor his property shall after his death be liable to the penalties of usury. It ought, therefore, to be evident that a man has died a usurer, in order that he may be so adjudged after his death and his effects disposed of as those of a usurer.”⁵ Even loans at interest by Christians, in the form of pledges of land, advantageous leases and bonds under seal, seem to have been enforced by the Common Law courts, whatever the effect of making such contracts may have been upon the usurer’s sale, or as a ground for forfeiting his property at his death. Glanville tells us that a pledge, the proceeds and rents whereof are not to reduce the debt, is “unjust and dishonest, and is that called a mortgage, but this is not prohibited by the King’s Court, although it considers such a pledge as a species of usury. Hence if any one die having such a pledge, and this be proved after his death, his property shall be disposed of no otherwise than as the effects of a usurer.”⁶ The necessities of commerce made loans of money imperative, and few were willing to loan without interest.⁷ Accordingly, we find that Parliament, by statute fixed the rate of interest at ten pounds per cent per annum, and made it a penal offense to exact more. A subsequent statute,⁸ forbade interest at any rate, and provided for a forfeiture of the debt if interest were exacted. A subsequent statute⁹ repealed the statute of Edward VI., and re-enacted the statute of Henry VIII. Subsequent statutes reduced the rate to eight pounds per cent,¹⁰ six pounds per cent,¹¹ and five pounds per cent.¹² In England, after experimenting for nearly three hundred years, it was finally decided that usury statutes were unsound in principle, and they were accordingly repealed, the parties being free to fix by contract such rate of interest as they might agree upon.¹³ In the United States some of the states have not fixed any rate of interest, the parties being free to make such contract as they please. Most of the states, however, fix by statute some rate of interest, varying in different localities, as the maximum rate which the parties may agree upon.

Usury, as the term is applied at Modern Law, consists in contracting for a higher rate of interest than that fixed by statute for the use of money.¹ Unless a rate higher than that fixed by law is contracted for the contract is not usurious.² Accordingly a contract for a rate not higher than that fixed by statute is not usurious, even if the rate after maturity is higher than that before maturity.³ Hence a contract, some provisions of which would by themselves be usurious, is valid if it provides on an accounting for a repayment only of the sum actually loaned with lawful interest.⁴ So if the intent of a contract taken as a whole, is to exact only lawful interest, it is not usurious though certain provisions may seem to exact a higher rate.⁵ If the contract itself is valid, the wrongful misapplication of payments cannot amount to usury.⁶ No contract authorized by law can be usurious.⁷ Hence certain classes of contracts such as small loans or loans by building and loan associations,⁸ if excepted from the general operation of the usury laws by statute are not usurious. If exemption from the general usury laws is claimed, however, by virtue of a special statute, the case must be brought strictly within such statute.⁹ If the statute fixes six per cent as the legal rate, unless the parties in writing fix a higher rate, in which case they cannot fix a rate higher than eight per cent, a charge of seven per cent as interest upon interest, and of twelve per cent as interest on overdrafts is usurious, there being no written contract for either.¹⁰ A question as to the nature of usury has caused a conflict of judicial decisions as to particular forms of contracts which are claimed to be usurious. The question is whether it is the amount to be paid by the debtor or the amount which is received by the creditor directly or indirectly, that is to be considered as the payment for the use of money in determining whether usury exists. On the one hand it seems to be held that payment of interest made partly by the debtor and partly by a third person is usurious if such payments, when added together, exceed the maximum legal rate, even if the amount paid by the debtor alone did not exceed such rate.¹¹ On the other hand it has been held that a loan by A to B on consideration that B will convey to C property other than that mortgaged to secure such debt is not usurious.¹² The solution of this question determines cases where in addition to the highest rate of interest the debtor agrees to pay commissions,¹³ or expenses of making the loan.¹⁴ As will be observed from the discussion of these subjects in subsequent sections, the courts are neither harmonious nor consistent in their answer to this question. "Usury" is also used as a concrete noun to denote the illegal interest exacted or contracted for.¹⁵

A wrongful or corrupt intent to exact a higher rate of interest than that fixed by law is said to be an essential element of usury.¹ "Usury is a matter of intention, and to avoid a contract on that ground it must appear that the lender knew the facts and acted with a view of evading the law."² "To constitute usury within the prohibitions of the law there must be an intention knowingly to contract for or to take usurious interest; for if neither party intend it, but act bona fide and innocently, the law will not infer a corrupt agreement. Where, indeed, the contract upon its very face imports usury, as by an express reservation of more than legal interest, there is no room for legal presumption; for the intent is apparent, res ipsa loquitur. But where the contract, on its face, is for legal interest only, there it must be proved that there was some corrupt agreement or device or shift to cover usury, and that it was in the full contemplation of the parties."³ Within certain limits this principle is sound. Its application to mistakes of fact or expression insofar that it prevents the penalties and forfeitures fixed by the usury laws from applying, is clear. Thus if the provision for an excessive rate is due to a mistake in expression,⁴ as where the provision is inserted either by that borrower,⁵ or by the agent of the lender,⁶ without the knowledge of the lender in either case; or if it is due to a failure of the scrivener to strike out a printed clause in the form on which the mortgage was written,⁷ such mistake does not make the contract usurious. So an error in computation in which the lender is in good faith seeking to avoid usury,⁸ as where, by mistake in dates, interest is computed for a greater time than that agreed upon⁹ does not make the contract usurious, especially where the excess over the legal rate is very slight.¹⁰ So if in an honest attempt to purge a contract of usury by eliminating usurious items the parties by mistake omit to eliminate certain items the new contract is not usurious.¹¹ So where interest coupons bore date before the money was delivered, and interest for such intervening time was credited on the lender's books, but by mistake was not credited upon the first coupon due, the contract is not usurious.¹² If, however, the real agreement was usurious, the fact that by mistake a greater rate of interest than even that agreed upon was inserted in the contract does not prevent the contract from being usurious.¹³ The courts have in some cases gone further, and held that a bona fide belief in the legality of the interest charged will prevent the contract from being so usurious as to charge the lender with penalties.¹⁴ Some courts have held that the intent to contract for usury must be entertained by both borrower and lender to constitute usury. Under this theory fraud in inducing the borrower to execute a note and mortgage for an amount larger than he intended is not usury, even if the difference between the amount loaned and the amount provided for in the contract exceeds the highest legal rate of interest.¹⁵ So it has been held that where the lender fraudulently induces the borrower to pay him money by alleging that it is for expenses of making a loan, fraud exists but no usury.¹⁶ The view taken by other courts makes the contract for unlawful interest usury without reference to the intention of the parties.¹⁷ Apart from mistakes in expression and in computation, this is undoubtedly the correct view. Hence a bona fide mistake of law does not prevent the contract from being usurious.¹⁸

Since usury is an agreement for an excessive rate of interest for the use of money, it follows that if the contract is for paying such excessive rate for something other than the use of money, or for the use of money and something else in addition thereto, such contract is not usury. Thus if the contract provides for the repayment of the debt not absolutely but only upon a certain contingency which may or may not happen, a contract for a rate of interest higher than that fixed by statute is not usury.¹ If the provision for non-payment in a given contingency is not bona fide, but is "a mere shift and device to cover usury,"² the contract may be usurious. Thus if a loan is made secured by mortgage on realty, to be paid when due, unless the debtor died under certain circumstances specified in detail, in which case the notes were to be surrendered and the mortgage cancelled, the contract was held usurious where the amount to be repaid was greatly in excess of the legal rate, and as part of the contract the insured was to pass a medical examination for life insurance and the creditor insured the debtor's life to protect itself against loss.³ In the cases here cited interest for the entire principal was computed and added to the principal. The sum thus obtained was divided into equal amounts payable at equal intervals during the life of the loan.⁴ If, however, the contract is for the absolute repayment of the principal, and the contingency affects the rate of interest only, the contract is usurious.⁵ In other cases such a contract has been held to be valid.⁶ So a provision for paying a share of profits as remuneration for the use of money is held not to be usurious.⁷

Since usury contemplates the use of money, the contract for the legal rate of interest up to maturity, and providing for an increase after maturity over the legal rate, is, in the absence of special statute, held not to be usury, since the contract is not for the use of money but to compel its payment at maturity. So it has been said that if the statute does not specifically provide for the rate of interest after maturity the parties may contract for any rate they please.¹ This principle was recognized in the earlier cases² and has since been applied in many cases.³ This doctrine seems to have been applied originally to cases where the promise was to pay a lump sum in case of default in payment,⁴ as that if the debt was not discharged during the debtor's lifetime, her executor should pay it with twenty per cent added;⁵ or to contract to pay a certain sum at a certain time, but giving to the debtor the option to discharge the contract by paying a smaller sum before such time,⁶ or to pay a commission for collection if the debt is not paid at maturity.⁷ So a provision for an additional payment if the mortgagor of mortgaged property sells it before paying the mortgage debt, has been held not to be usurious.⁸ It has been extended also to cases in which the debtor is to pay an increased rate of interest after maturity in excess of the legal rate.⁹ The reason for this rule suggested in these cases is that since the debtor may pay the debt at the time indicated and relieve himself from further liability, the contract is not usurious, as it is without the statute fixing the rate to be contracted for for forbearance.¹⁰ Whether the agreement to pay the additional rate of interest is valid, or whether it is to be treated merely as a penalty and invalid, is another question which is discussed elsewhere.¹¹ It is not, however, usury, and does not invalidate the valid provisions of the contract. The application of this principle, however, presupposes that the contract is a bona fide one and not intended as an evasion of the usury laws.¹² If it appears that the contract is really for forbearance at an illegal rate of interest, and not as a means of enforcing prompt payment, it is usurious.¹³ Hence if the real understanding of the parties is that the note is not to be paid until a year after maturity, the contract for illegal interest renders the transaction usurious.¹⁴ So it has been held that as a contract for illegal interest if made at maturity can be only for forbearance and not to enforce prompt payment, it is usurious.¹⁵ Where the contract for excessive interest after maturity is made when the note is executed the mere fact of forbearance to sue does not show an evasion of the usury laws.¹⁶ Under some statutes a contract for a rate of interest after maturity, exceeding the legal rate, is usury.¹⁷ This result is reached in Texas under the statutory definition of interest as a sum allowed for the detention of money.¹⁸ In some states which, under former statutes, allowed interest after maturity in excess of the legal rate, statutes have since been passed specifically forbidding such contracts and making them usurious.¹⁹

for usury are quite rare. One of the most important problems under the law of usury is to detect the disguises under which the parties seek to mask the real nature of the transaction. Since these disguises assume the form of legitimate contracts outside the usury statutes it is constantly necessary to distinguish the real intent of the parties from the form in which the contract is expressed. Any device whereby a greater amount than the maximum rate fixed by statute is charged for forbearance of the use of money is usury.¹ If the maximum legal rate of interest is charged, and the lender as a part of the contract of loan requires the borrower to pay another debt upon which he is not himself liable, such payment constitutes usury.² A simple disguise which is always held to be usury, consists in adding the usury to the principal, making the note or promise to pay, for a larger sum than that advanced, the face of the note exceeding the sum advanced and the highest legal rate of interest thereon, and the transaction being merely to secure compensation for the forbearance of money.³ If the amount added to the sum advanced is not compensation for forbearance, but is for some other outstanding liability, the transaction is not usurious.⁴ Hence the mere fact that the amount advanced is less than the face of the note does not of itself establish usury.⁵ If the intention of the parties is not to charge compensation for the use of money, the transaction is not usurious even if the note given exceeds the amount advanced. Thus notes for future advances of money and supplies were given. The person who agreed to furnish the supplies (a person other than the payee) did not furnish all that he agreed to furnish. This was a breach of contract, causing partial failure of consideration, but was not usury.⁶ If the face of the note is less than the amount furnished, with the maximum legal rate of interest, the contract is not usurious, though the face of the note is larger than the amount advanced.⁷

Another disguise of usury consists in executing a note bearing a legal rate of interest, and an additional note for the usurious excess over the legal rate.¹ The entire contract is tainted with usury in such case, and not merely the note given specifically for the interest.²

A question, happily long since obsolete, once arose where a loan of depreciated currency was made and a note given therefor at par. Whether this was usury or not depended entirely on the intention of the parties. If they intended it to disguise a usurious loan its form did not make it valid.¹ An agreement to repay in specie tended very strongly to establish the fact that the entire contract was usurious.² On the other hand such loans were not treated as usurious if such was not the intention of the parties.³ So if a loan of coin was made, an

If the contract contemplates the payment of money in another place, adding exchange is not usury.¹ If, however, the note is to be paid where made, and the addition of exchange is for the purpose of collecting a rate of interest greater than the legal rate the contract is usurious.²

§470. Rate of interest of other state.

If the debt is really payable in another state the parties may exact the maximum rate of interest provided for by the law either of the state where the contract is made or the state where it is payable.¹ If, however, the contract is really payable where made, and the provision as to payment in another state is inserted in order to permit a charge of a greater rate than the maximum permitted in the place where the contract is really payable, it is usurious.² If a bill is drawn and discounted the fact that the drawer did not himself expect to pay it in another place, but expected the drawee to pay it for him in such other place does not make it usurious.³

If the highest legal rate of interest is charged, and is collected in advance, there is a technical infraction of the usury laws. The courts, however, have deferred to methods of business insofar that if such loans are for short times, the transaction is treated as not usurious.¹ If, however, the loan is for a long time, and the interest for a long period is deducted in advance, the transaction is held to be usurious, as it undoubtedly is.² Deducting interest for one year in advance has been held not to be usury.³ Receiving interest for five years in advance has been held to be usury, where the amount reserved and the amount agreed to be paid together exceed the original loan with the highest legal rate of interest.⁴ So if such amount is exacted as to exceed the maximum legal rate upon the nominal amount loaned, the contract is clearly usurious.⁵

Requiring the payment of interest at short intervals is not usury,¹ even if the statute fixes the maximum rate of interest at a certain rate "payable annually."²

A contract for paying interest for the entire debt for the entire period of the loan, but providing for repaying the loan in installments, is usurious if the rate thus exacted exceeds the maximum legal rate for the time for which the money has been actually enjoyed by the debtor.¹ The favorite device for concealing the true rate of interest in such cases — sometimes even from the debtor — is to compute the interest for the entire time, add it to the principal, divide this sum by the number of months, and take notes, each for this amount, and due one each month.

If the contract does not require any payment before the end of the period for which interest is computed, and payment according to the terms of the contract would not result in usury, the fact that payment is in fact made by the debtor and accepted by the creditor before maturity cannot make the contract usurious.²

A form of disguising usury consists in computing it at a rate apparently legal, but for a period of time longer than that for which the debtor has the use of the money. The method generally resorted to in this form of usury is ante-dating the note so as to make interest begin to run from a time before the loan was made, and making the time for which interest is computed extend beyond the time at which the principal is to be repaid. Dating a note back before the time of the loan so as to make the interest run for a period longer than that for which the debtor has the use of the money is usury if the interest thus exacted exceeds the maximum legal rate for the actual time for which the loan is made.¹ If such ante-dating is not intended to cover usury,² as where the instrument was dated back to the time that the money was set aside for the debtor's use,³ even if not paid for some time thereafter owing to delay in erecting a building, the loan being payable as the building progresses;⁴ or where interest for the time between the date of the loan and the time that the debtor receives the money is credited to the debtor⁵ the contract is not usurious. The instrument cannot be dated back to the time when a loan was promised but no amount was agreed upon.⁶ An agreement made after an instrument has taken effect for paying a higher rate than that originally stipulated, though not higher than that fixed by law, is not usurious though the time at which such higher rate is to begin is dated back before the date of such agreement.⁷

In a contract which reserves the highest legal rate of interest, it is often provided that if the interest is not paid when due it shall bear interest or shall be added to the principal. Such contracts are generally held not to be usurious.¹ The reason given is that the creditor can avoid such interest on interest, by paying interest when due.² In some states, while such agreement is not usurious, the provision for interest on interest cannot be enforced.³ Some states, however, treat agreements for interest on interest as usurious, on the theory that the total interest to be paid under such contracts exceeds the maximum legal rate of interest on the principal.⁴ Since the borrower could pay interest when due and stop interest on interest, and since if he paid it when due, he could at once borrow the same amount and pay interest thereon, this view of the law seems absurd. Even where a provision in advance for interest on interest is not enforceable, the parties may, on the maturity of the debt, capitalize interest due, with the original principal, in a new note.⁵ Accordingly in some of the cases holding such contracts to be usurious, the courts appear to look upon their decisions as unsound in principle, and justified only by precedents which they felt bound to follow.⁶ Even where an agreement to pay interest on interest has been held to be usurious it has been held that separate interest coupons will bear interest after maturity.⁷ It appears therefore that even those courts which treat as usurious agreements in advance for interest on interest pay attention rather to the outward form of the contract than to its essential nature. If the credits on a debt exceed the interest, carrying the balance into a new debt less than the original principal cannot be said to exceed the legal rate, the rate contracted for not exceeding that allowed by law.⁸ If by statute compounding interest oftener than once a year is forbidden, a contract providing for compounding it oftener is usurious.⁹ Compound interest is sometimes specifically forbidden by statute and is therefore usury, even if the rate reserved is, after the compound interest is added, below the amount allowed by statute.¹⁰

"Unless there was a loan there can be no usury."¹ The usury statutes, therefore, do not apply to a genuine contract for the payment of money in consideration of the sale of property.² A genuine contract of sale cannot be treated as usurious even if the price to be paid is in excess of the real value of the property.³ So a contract for the sale and repurchase of stock is not usurious, as there is no debt.⁴ The fact that the sale was at a greater price than that paid by the vendor,⁵ or that such advantageous sale was made at the same time as a loan, the note in question being given for both debts,⁶ does not of itself make the contract usurious. A contract of sale is, however, a favorite method of disguising usury. The transaction may be a real loan between the parties, and exorbitant interest may be charged by requiring the borrower as a part of the transaction to pay an excessive price for property sold to him by the lender. If this is the real intent of the parties, such contract is usurious.⁷ A contract to pay one dollar and twenty-five cents a week for sixty-three weeks, the party making such payments to receive, on surrender of his contract, a diamond which the adversary party agreed to buy back for one hundred and twenty dollars, was held to be usurious.⁸ So a transaction which takes the form of rescinding a sale of land and making a new sale at a higher price is usurious if the increase in price is meant as usury on the debt⁹ though a similar contract has been held not to be usurious.¹⁰ Usually in these forms of usury the lender acts as vendor, the borrower as vendee. The situation may, however, be reversed. Thus a borrower agreed to sell from his plantation an amount of cotton greatly in excess of what the plantation could produce, agreeing to pay a certain sum for each bale of the deficiency at a stipulated penalty. * If such contract was a part of the contract for lending money, and the penalties were contracted for merely to cover usury, the transaction, it was held, would be usurious.¹¹ So if, as part of the contract of loan, the lender requires the borrower to sell him property at an inadequate price, to be reconveyed on payment of a much larger amount, such contract has been held to be usurious.¹² In a genuine sale of property between the parties an excessive price may be agreed upon in consideration of deferring the payment, with a provision for a less price in case of prompt payment. Even if the difference between the price in case of prompt payment and the price in case of deferred payment exceeds the maximum legal rate of interest, no usury exists.¹³ So a contract to pay a certain sum of money at a certain date, with a provision for discharging the obligation before maturity by delivering a specific article of merchandise at a specific price is not on its face usurious.¹⁴ If a debt is incurred by such means, however, an excessive rate of interest for delay constitutes usury as in the case of other debts.

obligation in full.² If, however, there is an absolute guaranty,³ the transaction has been held usurious. If, however, the vendor sells an obligation on which he is primarily liable, at such discount, the transaction is merely one of giving an obligation for a sum larger than the debt, and is usurious if the discount exceeds the maximum rate of interest.⁴ If, however, by special statute the borrower under such circumstances is authorized to sell his own obligations at such rate of discount, the transaction is not usurious, as a sale by railroad of its own bonds.⁵ Under the National Banking Act discounts as well as loans are forbidden if at a greater rate than the maximum fixed by the state statutes. Accordingly, a discount of paper at a rate greater than that allowed by law is usurious if made by a national bank,⁶ even if, had state statute controlled, such discount would not have been usurious.⁷ Accommodation paper has no legal validity until it passes into the hands of one who pays value for it. This is its true execution. Accordingly as such taker is really buying from the maker, he commits usury if, with notice of its character, he discounts it at a rate exceeding the maximum legal rate of interest.⁸ If such holder has not notice of its character and believes that he is buying from the true owner thereof, the better reasoning holds that he is not guilty of usury by buying it at a discount exceeding the maximum legal rate.⁹ In other jurisdictions it is held that a discount of accommodation paper is usurious if at a rate exceeding the maximum legal rate, even if the party making such discount does not know of its character.¹⁰

A loan made by a building and loan association generally provides for payment of interest, premiums for making the loan, certain dues as a member of the association, dues on stock and fines and penalties for delinquencies. To what extent these different payments can be added together and counted as interest, for the purpose of determining whether the transaction is usurious, is a question upon which there is a conflict of authority in the absence of special statute. Some courts treat the different payments as in effect compensation for the use of the money loaned, and hold, therefore, that if the aggregate payments are by the contract to exceed the principal and the highest rate of interest the transaction is usurious.¹ In other States, such transactions are held not to be usurious.² Some courts have assigned as the reason for this view, that payments of premiums and the like are not usury, since the members may by performing their contracts, participate in the fund formed by such premiums.³ Other States place the reason for this view on the ground that the time of payment, depending on the maturity of the shares, is uncertain,⁴ or that the transaction is a sale of the stock to the association,⁵ or a sale of future dividends,⁶ or that the loan is an advance payment to the borrower of the value of his stock.⁷ Special statutes have placed transactions of building and loan associations on a different footing in many states from ordinary transactions. As far as such transactions are authorized by statute they are of course not usurious.⁸ These statutes must be strictly complied with to make legal transactions which but for them would be made invalid by the general usury laws.⁶ Thus while premiums fixed by competitive bidding to obtain priority in security loans may not be usurious though in addition to the maximum rate of interest¹⁰ a premium fixed by a loan association at an arbitrary sum in addition to the maximum rate of interest, without competitive bidding is usury.¹¹ If the transaction whereby the loan is made is independent of the transaction of subscription to the stock, the amount to be paid on the stock cannot of course be added to the amount to be paid as interest to determine whether the transaction is usurious.¹²

A bona fide contract to pay for work and labor is not usury, even if the price agreed upon is excessive.¹ Such a contract may, however, be a cover for usury. Thus if the borrower agrees to pay in addition to interest a further sum to the lender as salary for a position accepted by the lender, which it is understood involves no duties, work or responsibility, such contract is usurious if a rate greater than the maximum allowed by law is thus exacted.²

A contract between the owner of goods and a commission merchant, by which the merchant is to make advances upon the goods and sell them and receive therefor commissions which exceed the legal rate of interest for the advances made, is not usurious if the transaction is a genuine one.¹ If, however, the contract specifically provides for additional commissions in case advances are made, which commissions exceed the legal rate of interest,² or if it appears that the entire transaction is merely a cover for a loan, and that the property sent to the so-called commission merchant is a pledge to secure such loan, the transaction is usurious.

§481. Commissions of agent of borrower.

A commission or bonus for obtaining a loan is often paid by the borrower in addition to the rate of interest. If the amount of this commission, together with the rate of interest, exceeds the maximum rate, the question whether usury exists or not depends then upon the relation of the parties to the transaction. If the agent is the agent of the borrower, the commission paid to him does not make the contract usurious.¹ If the agent of the borrower divides his commissions with the lender to induce him to make the loan, a question is presented whether the share of the commission thus received by the lender should be added to the interest agreed upon to determine whether the contract is usurious. On the one hand such commission enures to the benefit of the lender, and comes indirectly from the borrower; and accordingly some courts have held that if the commissions paid to the lender, and the interest agreed upon, exceed the legal rate the contract is usurious.² It is said that if the lender actually receives part of the commission, it makes no difference whether he receives it from his agent, a broker, or the borrower's agent.³ Still this principle has been held not to apply where the borrower's agent divides his commissions with the lender after the loan is made and not as the result of any previous agreement.⁴ On the other hand the lender has agreed to pay the commission to his agent, and as long as there is no understanding between borrower and lender for making such payment, such payment cannot be said with any accuracy to be made for the use of money. Accordingly other courts have held that the payment of such commissions cannot constitute usury.⁵

If the person to whom the commissions are paid is a broker, acting as an intermediary between the parties, but not representing either of them solely, commission paid to him cannot be computed as interest in order to determine whether the contract is usurious.¹ If the intermediary broker is a corporation the fact that the lender is a stockholder therein and thus receives an indirect benefit from the commissions paid to it on loans made by him does not make the contract usurious.²

If the agent is the agent of the lender, the rule in some states, in the absence of statute, is that if the lender does not himself receive any part of the commission, and the agent retains it all, the transaction is not usurious.¹ In some states the transaction is held to be usurious.² Where this view obtains there is a further divergence of authority as to the effect of the lender's want of knowledge that the agent was exacting a bonus or commission for the agent's benefit. In some states such knowledge is spoken of as an essential element of usury, usury existing if the principal has such knowledge, and the commission plus the rate of interest contracted for exceeds the maximum rate allowed by law;³ while if the principal does not have such knowledge, the exaction of such commissions by his agent does not constitute usury.⁴ These cases go upon the theory that the borrower's agreement with the lender's agent to pay him a commission for making the loan is a conspiracy between them to violate the law, and the consequences of such act should not be imposed upon the innocent lender,⁵ and that in making such exaction the agent is exceeding his authority and cannot charge his principal with the consequences of his acts.⁶ Indeed, from one point of view, it seems as if the borrower is paying the commission to the lender's agent to induce him to make the loan for some motive other than the sole consideration of his principal's interests; conduct which is rather fraud upon the principal than the commission by him of an illegal act. In some states the knowledge of the lender is held to be immaterial and the transaction is, in such cases, treated as usurious, even if the lender does not know that his agent is exacting commissions.⁷ In some cases a view is taken which reconciles some of the foregoing cases; namely that if the lender does not pay his agent for negotiating the loan he must be presumed to know that he has exacted a commission from the borrower.⁸

If the lender is to receive a part of the commission paid to his agent, the transaction is usurious.¹ If the payment to the agent is only a cover for the exaction of unlawful interest by the lender, the contract is usurious.² The existence of usury is clearer if the commission for securing the loan is paid directly to the lender himself.³

Wherever the question of whose agent the person receiving the commission is, becomes material, the question is as to the fact of the agency and not what the parties to the transaction agree to call it. Hence if he is really the agent of the lender, the fact that the borrower signs an agreement constituting such person his agent to procure the loan does not prevent him from being treated in law as the agent of the lender.¹ Payment of commissions to an agent must be distinguished from payment of commissions to a lender who then assigns the loan to another. The agent may, under his contract with the lender, advance his own money to the borrower and trust to subsequent reimbursement by the lender without himself becoming the lender.² If, however, he advances his own money to the borrower before the lender has agreed to make the loan in question, the so-called agent is the real lender, even if the so-called lender afterwards accepts the loan and authorizes the agent to reimburse himself from the lender's money in his hands.³

A contract to pay the expenses of the lender in making the loan is not usurious if the transaction is a genuine one, even if the amount of the expenses thus charged, together with the interest reserved, exceeds the legal rate.¹ Thus a contract to pay to the lender his loss in sacrificing securities to obtain the money lent,² or the costs of examining the title, and preparing a mortgage,⁵ or legal services in cancelling a lien on the property mortgaged,⁴ even if the lender himself acts as attorney,⁵ or to pay the lender the expense of examining the security offered⁶ is not of itself necessarily usurious. Such a transaction, however, is a favorite method of disguising usury; and if the charge for the expenses is unreasonably excessive, the transaction is held to be usurious.⁷

A provision that the borrower shall pay taxes,¹ or insurance premiums,² on the property mortgaged; or that the borrower shall pay the lender for services to be rendered as trustee of the mortgaged realty,³ is not usury, if bona fide. A provision that the borrower shall pay taxes upon the amount of the loan, and that if the lender is obliged, himself, to pay taxes thereon, the borrower will reimburse him, is held not to be usurious.⁴

upon him in the event of suit, are held in some states not to be usurious,¹ on the theory that such provision does not operate until there has been a breach of the contract;² while in other states they are held to be usurious.³ It by no means follows that the provision for paying attorney fees is held valid in all the states which hold that it is not usurious.⁴ A promise made after the rendition of a judgment to induce forbearance in the collection thereof, to pay the fees of the attorney of the creditor, in addition to the maximum rate of interest allowed by law, has been held to be usurious.⁵

A loan of credit by one person to another, whereby such other obtains a loan of money, or extension of credit from a third person, is not a contract for the use of money. Accordingly, a contract whereby the person borrowing the money agrees to pay the person lending him his credit a sum therefor which exceeds the lawful rate of interest upon the amount borrowed by him from such third person, is not usurious.¹

A genuine contract of partnership, by the terms of which a partner who advances money as capital is to receive out of the proceeds of the business an annual return exceeding the maximum legal rate of interest, is not usurious.¹ So if a loan is made, as distinguished from a partnership, a provision for sharing profits as a substitute for interest does not make the transaction usurious.² If, however, the amount of the probable profits is estimated in money, and the share that the lender is to receive is expressed in money, and not expressed as a part of the profits nor made contingent on the earning of such profits, the transaction is usurious.³ So if a loan of money is made, on which the maximum legal rate of interest is reserved, an agreement whereby the borrower is to divide with the lender the profits out of a certain transaction in addition to interest, is usurious.⁴

A contract for rent, if genuine, is not usurious even if the rent reserved is disproportionate to the real rental value of the property. A contract of rent, however, may be used as a means of disguising a usurious loan.¹

§492. Annuity contracts.

A contract for the payment of an annuity is not in itself usurious, even though the amount to be paid annually is not proportionate to the amount paid for such annuity by the annuitant.¹ If the transaction is really the satisfaction of a debt by an annuity to be paid by the debtor to the creditor, the transaction is not usurious even if the annuity is called interest.² Such a transaction is sometimes made the means of disguising usury, and if the transaction is really a loan, the contract will be held to be usurious.³ The Supreme Court of the United States has held that an agreement to repay the loan is not essential to usury.⁴

If the lender as a term of the contract of loan requires the borrower to take insurance on his own life from the lender, paying to the lender premiums thereon, some courts have held that the profit thus derived from the insurance must be added to the interest contracted for in determining whether the contract is usurious or not;¹ especially where the policy is assigned to the lender at once to secure the loan,² or where in addition to such assignment the payment of both loan and premiums is secured by a deed of trust on realty.³ Other states have held that such transactions are not necessarily usurious.⁴ A loan of a premium by an insurance company with a provision that

III. EXECUTORY USURIOUS CONTRACTS.

A contract usurious in its nature will not be enforced by the courts.¹ Whether such contract is illegal or merely void is a difficult question to answer, as the exact effect of such contract depends on the wording and construction of the statute by which such excessive rate of interest is forbidden. Such statutes in terms, varying in different jurisdictions, provide with considerable exactness the effect of such transactions; and the courts rarely feel authorized to apply thereto the Common Law principles of illegal or void contracts, in addition to the express requirements of the statute. This rests upon the familiar principle that where a statute creates a new right or offense and provides a specific remedy or punishment, that remedy alone can apply.² In some jurisdictions, apart from the question of the right to recover the principal, which is hereafter discussed, it is held that other provisions of an inseverable usurious contract, such as a valid provision for attorney's fees,³ are themselves enforceable if no other objection than that of usury exists thereto. Where this view obtains such contracts are not illegal. Further, in some jurisdictions, collateral securities are enforced up to the amount lawfully due.⁴ Where this view obtains such contracts cannot be classed as illegal, in the sense in which the term is used at Common Law.⁵ Under usury statutes the principal loaned may be recovered.⁶ The effect of the usury statutes is for the most part confined to the interest paid or agreed to be paid. Under many statutes an agreement for usury causes a forfeiture of the entire interest, leaving only the principal to be recovered.⁷ Accordingly, one who has tendered the principal may recover possession of property pledged to secure the loan.⁸ If the contract is originally for lawful interest, and usurious interest is subsequently contracted for, interest from and after the date of the usurious contract is forfeited.⁹ In some states the forfeiture applies only to interest due up to maturity, on the theory that from maturity interest is given by the law and not by the contract;¹⁰ in other states interest is forfeited both before and after maturity;¹¹ and under the statutes of other states, while interest up to maturity if not itself usurious is not forfeited, an exaction of the same rate after maturity, not being by express agreement, may cause the forfeiture of all interest after maturity.¹² Under other statutes the forfeiture is only the excess of interest over the legal rate.¹³

Under the Federal statute which fixes the rate of interest which national banks may charge,¹ a contract for usurious interest causes a forfeiture of all interest.² This act is, however, exclusive as to the effect of usury upon the executory contract for interest, though it adopts the law of the state where the bank is located as to the rate which constitutes usury. Hence it applies to usurious contracts of national banks in determining their effect to the exclusion of state statutes.³ Hence even if the law of the state in which the bank is situated makes usury effect a forfeiture of the entire debt,⁴ usurious contracts made by a national bank causes a forfeiture of interest but not of principal.⁵

Whether the debtor is bound to pay or tender the amount actually due with interest, to obtain relief against a usurious contract, depends in part upon the relation of the parties to the suit, and in part upon the provisions of the local statute. If the borrower seeks in equity the affirmative relief of cancellation, he must, in the absence of special statute, pay or offer to pay the amount of the indebtedness, with such interest thereon as is lawfully due.¹ If, however, the amount actually due, cannot be determined definitely until an accounting, an actual tender of the amount which the debtor admits to be due, together with an offer in the debtor's bill in equity to pay the amount legally due, is sufficient.² The provisions of certain statutes, however, make securities in contracts given on a usurious consideration absolutely void, and require their cancellation without conditions. Under such statutes an offer to repay the amount borrowed is not necessary in order to enable the debtor to have such contracts or conveyances cancelled.³ In a suit by the debtor for cancellation, he may have the amount paid in by him as usurious interest applied in payment of the principal, even if he could not maintain a separate action in equity to recover it.⁴ If the creditor is seeking to enforce a usurious contract, equity may in a proper case restrain him from enforcing it, without requiring the previous payment of the amount due. Thus in an action by the creditor to enforce the usurious contract, the debtor may interpose usury as a defense without paying or tendering the amount of the debt.⁵ If the statute prevents recovery of interest on a usurious contract, the creditor can recover only the amount actually loaned by him.⁶ If the creditor seeks in equity a reformation of a mortgage which provides for usurious interest, he cannot have relief unless he offers to abate the whole of the usurious interest.⁷

A debtor who has paid or agreed to pay usurious interest is not estopped to allege usury, either for the purpose of defeating the contract or recovering payments, unless it is shown that he has induced the adversary party to change or alter his position in ignorance of the fact that the contract is usurious.¹ No agreement to waive the defense of usury can work an estoppel as against a creditor with full knowledge of the facts.² Hence a mortgagor, by consenting to a decree for the sale of the mortgaged property, does not waive his right to require that usurious interest paid in should be applied to the principal.³ If, however, the debtor induces third persons to buy the mortgage debt, representing that the contract is valid, he will be estopped as to them to set up the fact of usury.⁴ No estoppel, however, could exist if the assignee had notice of the facts.⁵ If the maker induces the surety to sign in ignorance of the fact that the contract is usurious, and the surety pays the debt and takes the assignment of the contract, the debtor will be estopped to set up the fact of usury.⁶ If, however, the surety knows that the debt is usurious, the mere failure of the debtor to object to the surety's paying the entire debt, does not estop him from interposing the defense of usury against the surety in an action by the surety to recover the full amount thus paid.⁷

If a judgment is rendered upon a claim which includes usury, such judgment is not void.¹ A sale and deed under such judgment are valid.² So a note given in satisfaction of a judgment cannot be avoided because the debt on which the judgment was rendered was usurious.³

IV. WHO CAN PLEAD USURY.

§499. Who can set up usury.—Debtor.

“The right to plead usury is the personal privilege of the debtor.”¹ This privilege may be exercised by him, even after a sale of the property mortgaged to secure such debt, as long as the original debtor is personally liable.² The defense may be interposed by a debtor who is liable for the debt, without reference to the form of the liability apparent upon the instrument evidencing the debt.³

closure of a mortgage executed upon the trust estate by the trustee.¹ An assignee or trustee in insolvency or bankruptcy may interpose usury as a defense if the fact that such usury exists affects the amount of assets coming into his hands.² If, however, the assignee is appointed for the benefit of certain creditors, not including the creditor whose contract is usurious, and the assignee holds no property in that capacity which is chargeable with such debt, and the assets coming to him will not be affected by the fact of such usury, the assignee cannot interpose the defense of usury.³ The receivers of a corporation may interpose the defense of usury against the mortgage given by such corporation,⁴ even if in the particular case the defense will enure exclusively to the benefit of a subsequent mortgagee.⁵ A widow, claiming her year's support, may attack as usurious a deed given by her husband to secure a debt.⁶

made,³ and others that it cannot.⁴ If a surety, knowing that a contract is usurious, pays the entire amount thereof, he cannot recover from his principal the amount of usury thus paid, in jurisdictions where the surety could have resisted recovery beyond the amount of the loan and legal interest.⁵ So if A, for B's accommodation, gives his own note to X, and takes therefor a note from B, B can interpose the defense of usury, even though the notes bear the rate originally agreed upon between B and X.⁶

The creditor who has exacted usurious interest cannot take advantage of the usury to avoid the contract.¹ Hence, if a note payable in the future has been given to evidence such debt, the creditor cannot sue before the maturity of the note, upon the theory that the entire transaction is void;² nor can he sue upon a prior valid note which has been paid by the usurious note.³

§503. Other creditor.

In the absence of statute, a creditor of the debtor cannot set up the fact of usury in a contract between such debtor and another creditor,¹ even if the creditor setting up such defense has a lien upon the debtor's property, which is inferior to the lien held by such creditor,² and even though such debtor is insolvent.³ Under statutes in force in many jurisdictions, a creditor who holds a lien subsequent to another lien which secures a usurious debt may set up usury as a defense against such debt,⁴ especially if the debtor is insolvent.⁵ So under a statute making void a pledge given for a usurious debt, a subsequent mortgagee who agrees to take subject to outstanding liens may avoid such pledge.⁶

A purchaser of property from a debtor, which is encumbered by a lien given to secure a usurious debt, cannot interpose usury as a defense against the enforcement of such lien.¹ Hence the assignee of a contract cannot avail himself of the defense of usury.² So if one of several persons jointly liable upon a note, assumes the payment of the shares of other persons liable on such note for a valuable consideration, he cannot set up usury as to the shares of such persons, though he may plead it as to his own.³ One who has purchased mortgaged realty cannot set up usury as a defense to the foreclosure of such mortgage,⁴ especially if he has assumed and agreed to pay such indebtedness, in which case he cannot avail himself of usury as a defense to avoid paying the full amount of the debt;⁵ nor can he in such case resist sale of the property under the mortgage,⁶ nor have payments of usurious interest by his grantor applied in discharge of the principal of the debt.⁷ It has been held, however, that if the clause of assumption of indebtedness does not specifically refer to the mortgage, either by description, or as to amount, the grantee may set up usury as a defense.⁸ If, after the purchase of such realty, without assuming personal liability therefor, the vendee subsequently agrees with the creditor to assume the usurious debt personally, and to pay the usurious interest due, such contract is in itself usurious.⁹ One who buys real or personal property¹⁰ at an execution sale cannot attack mortgages or other liens thereon on the ground of usury in the indebtedness secured by them. One exception to this general rule exists. If the mortgage¹¹ upon usurious consideration is void or voidable, and the original debtor intends in

One who is not a party to the usurious contract, nor the legal representative of the debtor, cannot set up the defense of usury in the absence of special circumstances.¹ An agent of the creditor who has collected a debt bearing usurious interest cannot interpose such usury in an action by his principal to compel an accounting.² An insurance company cannot resist an action brought by an assignee of a policy on the ground that the assignment was pursuant to a usurious contract.³ Special circumstances may, however, make a different rule apply. Thus if the contract to pay usury is separate from the contract to pay the principal and lawful interest, it lacks consideration and is not enforceable even as against a third person.⁴ So if notes have been obtained by fraud and subsequently pledged under a usurious contract, the maker can set up the fact of usury to show that the holder is not a bona fide purchaser under a statute making a pledge based on usury "invalid and illegal."⁵

EFFECT OF EXECUTORY ILLEGAL AND VOID CONTRACTS.

The class of void contracts includes all illegal contracts and in addition a number of contracts which are unenforceable but have not the distinct element of illegality.¹ Illegal contracts are not only unenforceable, but they contain the additional quality of rendering transactions and contracts void if connected with the illegal contract too closely.² As far as concerns an action to enforce a given covenant it makes no difference whether it is void or illegal.³

The term illegal is often loosely used. Thus it is sometimes applied to contracts which are merely ultra vires of the corporation making the contract,⁴ though such contracts should not be so classed.⁵ This confusion has doubtless arisen because many contracts are both illegal and ultra vires. So it is sometimes applied to contracts which are merely in excess of the authority

Thus in Gulf, etc., Ry. v. Hume, 87 Tex. 211; 27 S. W. 110, a covenant with a common carrier that in case of loss citation should be served on such carrier in forty days is called "void" and "illegal" without discrimination.

⁴ Such contract is termed "unlawful." Buckeye, etc., Co. v. Harvey, 92 Tenn. 115; 36 Am. St. Rep. 71; 18 L. R. A. 252; 20 S. W. 427.

of the agent who attempts to bind his principal. Cases of these last classes are of course not settled on principles of illegality at all.

The term "void" is also often loosely used. A distinction must be made between contracts which are void and those which may be made void at the election of one of the parties thereto.⁶ Prima facie the word void means that the transaction is null,⁷ yet the word is often misused for voidable.⁸ An illegal contract is not "voidable," as there is nothing to avoid.⁹ As far as it is executory it has no validity. Even third persons may take advantage of the illegality of an executory contract.¹⁰

Unless the terms of the contract or the surrounding facts show that the contract is illegal, the court will presume it to be valid.¹¹ Thus a contract of lease of Indian lands is valid so that rent may be recovered thereunder where lessee actually enjoys possession, though lessor, while holding the lands apparently with consent of the Indians, could have no valid title thereto, since his possession with their consent, is not illegal, and absence of consent is not shown.¹² On the other hand, if the contract is of a class prima facie illegal, such as a contract to influence legislation,¹³ it will be held illegal unless additional facts are shown which make it legal.

⁷ Wickliff v. Robinson, 18 Ill. 145; Woodbury v. Parker, 19 Vt. 353; 47 Am. Dec. 695; Land, etc., Co. v. McIntyre, 100 Wis. 245; 69 Am. St. Rep. 915; 75 N. W. 964.

⁹ So of a gambling contract. Merrill v. Garver (Neb.), 96 N. W. 619.

¹⁰ Cumberland, etc., Co. v. Evansville, 127 Fed. 187.

¹¹ Burdine v. Burdine, 98 Va. 515; 81 Am. St. Rep. 741; 36 S. E. 992; Houlton v. Nichol, 93 Wis. 393; 57 Am. St. Rep. 928; 33 L. R. A. 166; 67 N. W. 715.

¹³ Powers v. Skinner, 34 Vt. 274; 80 Am. Dec. 677.

If it can by its terms be performed lawfully, it will be treated as legal,¹⁴ even if performed in an illegal manner;¹⁵ while a contract entered into with intent to violate the law is illegal even if the parties may in performing depart from the contract and keep within the law.¹⁶

§507. Effect of illegal contract containing a single covenant.

If A makes a promise to B consisting of one covenant only and B in consideration thereof does or agrees to do one thing only, then if A's promise is to do an act which is either illegal or merely void, it is equally unenforceable. In such cases, therefore, there is no practical distinction between illegal and void contracts. Confusion in nomenclature in such cases is not uncommon.

Thus no action can be maintained on an illegal contract, the parties thereto being in pari delicto.¹ It is true that in refus-

no action can be maintained on such a contract,³ either for the prize⁴ or for tickets sold.⁵ So as wager contracts are now generally illegal, the winner cannot maintain an action against the loser for the thing wagered;⁶ nor can his assignee in bankruptcy,⁷ nor can one who acts as banker for betting and gambling recover from the losers for amounts advanced to winners.⁸

day contract.²² Other illustrations of this doctrine will be found under each of the chapters on illegal contracts.²³

So, as has been said,¹ a promise by A to B consisting of a single covenant which is void, is unenforceable.² Thus contracts in unreasonable restraint of trade are unenforceable.³ Even if performed voluntarily, a covenant in restraint of trade is no consideration for a promise based thereon.⁴ Equity will not enforce such contracts.⁵ On the other hand, equity will not give affirmative relief in the nature of cancellation of such a contract.⁶ So contracts waiving judicial rights,⁷ contracts waiving the discharge of duties imposed by law,⁸ wager insurance,⁹ and contracts in unreasonable restraint of marriage¹⁰ are unenforceable.

If A makes a promise to B consisting of two or more covenants, upon a valuable and legal consideration, and one of the covenants made by A is illegal and the other is legal, the question of whether the legal covenant can be enforced or not depends on whether the contract is severable or not. If the contract is severable, consisting in legal effect of distinct contracts, the legal covenant can be enforced.¹ Thus a contract whereby A agrees for compensation to make an illegal bid on certain realty for B, and to manage such realty at a certain rate of wages per month is enforceable as to the latter covenant.²

party to such a contract cannot ignore the illegal part and enforce the legal part.⁴ Thus where under an arrangement assumed to be illegal, stock was deposited as part of a pooling arrangement for voting it and was to be sold only on consent of three-fourths of the parties owning it, specific performance of a sale would not be decreed where less than three-fourths consented.⁵ Thus no recovery can be had on a contract in part for illegal lobbying services and in part for legal services if the contract is inseverable.⁶ Thus by the weight of modern authority and the better reasoning, a contract in restraint of trade, which of itself is reasonable and valid, is invalid if an inseverable part a scheme for creating a monopoly.⁷ Thus where a contract for the sale of beer is illegal, there can be no action on a covenant of such contract to return the barrels and cases⁸ or bottles⁹ in which such beer was shipped. So a contract for personal services, some of which are legal and others illegal, is invalid.¹⁰

This same rule is stated in a different form from the standpoint of consideration. If any part of an entire and indivisible consideration is illegal, all the promises based thereon are unenforceable, even though the residue of such consideration is part of a contract to furnish supplies, unlawful because the vendor was an officer of the vendee public corporation, the compensation for services being fixed with reference to the illegal sale.¹⁷ So a contract is unenforceable if the consideration consists in part of a lawful consideration and in part of alleged rights growing out of an illegal transaction.¹⁸

If, however, the parties have apportioned the different considerations among the respective covenants and such legal reciprocal considerations and covenants can be separated from the illegal, the legal ones can be enforced.¹⁹ This is the severable covenant already referred to in this section.

§510. Effect of contract containing two covenants, one only being void.

If A makes a promise to B, consisting of two or more covenants upon valuable and legal consideration, and one of the covenants made by A is void by reason of its subject-matter but not illegal, then the legal covenant can be enforced whether the contract is severable or inseverable.¹ In cases of this sort the distinction between void and illegal contracts is of the highest practical importance. Thus, as contracts in restraint of trade are merely void, and not illegal,² a promise in unreasonable restraint of trade made in connection with a sale of good-will is itself unenforceable, but the rest of the contract is valid if there is a consideration therefor.³ If a contract, one provision of which is in unreasonable restraint of trade is divisible, the remaining provisions will be enforced if supported by a consideration.⁴ Hence if a contract restrains trade over several different areas, and it is reasonable as to some but not as to others, it will be enforced as to the former though not as to the latter.⁵ Thus a contract in restraint of trade in a given city or any other place is valid as to such city;⁶ one restraining trade in a given county, state or the United States is valid as to such county,⁷ and one restraining trade in a given state or in the United States except Arizona and Nevada was held valid as to such state, where the business sold did not extend over the United States.⁸ If the contract restrains trade over an unreasonable area as a unit, the court cannot make a new contract for the parties by holding the contract good as to such part of that area as would be reasonable. Thus a contract not to engage in the retail sale of oil in any part of Indiana except Indianapolis being held unreasonable, cannot be enforced as to the town of Hammond, where the business sold was located.⁹ However, a contract not to compete within ten miles of a given point, which went in part beyond the limits of the county within which in California restraint is lawful, was held valid as to such county.¹⁰ If the contract is unreasonable as to time it is upheld for so long a time as the law allows where such time is definite. In California a contract in restraint of trade must, by statute, be limited to a county or part thereof and to such time as the vendee or one claiming under him should carry on the business purchased. A contract in restraint of trade, without time limit, has been held valid up to the statutory limit and void as to the residue.¹¹ A distinction is made in some courts between a contract not to engage in business, which if reasonable in space may be unlimited as to time,¹² and a contract not to engage in a profession, which must be reasonable as to time.¹³ So a contract otherwise valid containing a covenant void as in restraint of marriage is not thereby entirely invalidated, but only such covenant is void.¹⁴ So bills of lading otherwise valid, containing covenants void as relieving a common carrier from liability for negligence, is not entirely invalidated thereby, but only such provision is void.¹⁵ Like principles control insurance policies which contain covenants void as ousting the jurisdiction of courts,¹⁶ and contracts which attempt to waive statutory rights.¹⁷ This rule is sometimes expressed under the form of consideration. If one of two distinct considerations for a promise is void, as distinguished from illegal, the other legal consideration may support the contract.¹⁸

Ratification in its correct sense is impossible equally of an illegal¹ and of a void contract.² Thus a contract to arbitrate losses arising out of a future wagering sale is itself unlawful.³

Certain exceptions to this general rule exist in some jurisdictions. Whether a contract executed on Sunday may be ratified on a week day is a question on which courts differ. Some courts hold that such a contract cannot be ratified.⁴ An admission of the execution of the contract,⁵ or a part performance,⁶ or complete performance on one side,⁷ do not give the contract validity where this view of the law is held. Thus where A leased to B on Sunday at a given rent and B occupies the premises, A cannot recover the contract price but must sue for a reasonable rental.⁸ Keeping and using property sold and delivered on Sunday⁹ or money loaned on Sunday¹⁰ does not effect a ratification in such jurisdictions. Other courts hold that a Sunday contract may be ratified subsequently,¹¹ as by part payment of a Sunday note on a week day,¹² or by cashing on a week day a check given on Sunday,¹³ or payment of interest on a week day,¹⁴ or pre-payment of a part of a debt on a week day as consideration for a promise to extend the rest,¹⁵ or payment of the purchase price on a week day.¹⁶

Conduct which of itself amounts to a new contract is said to make valid a contract made on Sunday.¹⁷ Thus where A is appointed on Sunday to collect rents for a club, his appointment is made valid by his subsequently on week days acting as such collector and paying rents over to the club.¹⁸ An express promise made on a week day to perform a contract made on Sunday is held to make it valid,¹⁹ even in some jurisdictions where ratification in general is not recognized;²⁰ as by stating an account between the parties, including items for liquor sold on Sunday.²¹ In other jurisdictions an express promise is held not to make a Sunday contract valid.²² Where a Sunday contract is held void, and property²³ or services²⁴ are received thereunder, the party receiving the same is bound to pay a reasonable price therefor, though not the contract price. Such liability may therefore be the consideration for a subsequent express promise based thereon, even if in terms the same as the original promise.²⁵ Analysis of the cases cited shows some confusion of thought between the following theories: (a) that retention on a week day of benefits received on a week day under a Sunday contract ratifies it; (b) that such retention of benefits gives rise to an "implied promise" to pay a reasonable price therefor; (c) that such retention together with an express promise ratify the original contract; (d) that such retention is a consideration sufficient to support a subsequent express promise; and (e) that where the contract is both made on Sunday and to be performed on Sunday is illegal and creates no liability. In most cases the question of liability can be decided without necessarily determining which of these theories is the correct one. So by some statutes a contract invalid, when entered into because one of the parties thereto had not paid the license tax required by law, may be made valid by a subsequent payment of such license.²⁶

Modification or abandonment of an illegal contract by mutual agreement cannot be a lawful consideration for a new contract based on such original contract, even if there is some additional lawful consideration.¹ So dismissal of an action on an illegal contract is no lawful consideration for a promise based thereon.² So an express promise intended to discharge liability growing out of a wager contract in whole or in part is unenforceable.³ Options forbidden by statute, if not gambling, are at most merely void and do not invalidate other provisions of such contract.⁴ A reward offered to any one who produces a lottery ticket which has not been cashed promptly, if a winning ticket, affirms the unlawful wager contract and is itself illegal.⁵

An agreement subsequent to an unlawful act and made with reference thereto may be lawful if the original unlawful act is no part of the consideration therefor.⁶ Thus where A had made a contract with a city, which was illegal by statute since A was an alderman of such city, and A being financially involved, agreed with B to repay such sums as B would advance to complete such contract, A was not allowed to avoid liability to B because of the illegality of A's contract with the city.⁷ Property acquired under an illegal transaction may be a consideration for a subsequent new contract between the same parties.⁸

Negotiable paper given on an illegal consideration is invalid in the hands of the payee¹ and all who take with notice of the illegality,² or in the hands of one who takes without giving value therefor.³ A negotiable instrument given to stifle criminal prosecution is valid in the hands of a bona fide holder⁴ unless a statute makes it invalid.⁵ If transferred to a bona fide holder who takes without notice, for value, and before maturity, such negotiable paper is valid,⁶ except where a statute makes it absolutely void, even in the hands of bona fide hold-

hands of a holder with notice.² If the note is given on a wager contract it is unenforceable even though not given by the loser but by another person.³ So if A loses to B at cards, and C who owes A gives B his note to secure A's loss with A's consent, B cannot enforce such note against C.⁴ However, a note given in purchase of a right to recover from brokers either winnings or money paid is on consideration.⁵ Where a note given in settlement of a wager contract is in the hands of a bona fide holder, it is valid unless there is a statute making notes for wagers void even in the hands of a bona fide holder.⁶ If made void by statute in the hands of a bona fide holder, no recovery can be had thereon.⁷ A statute making a wager contract a crime, and making the transfer of a note on a wager consideration to a bona fide holder a crime, avoids such note in the hands of a bona fide holder, without a special provision to that effect.⁸

Neither renewals⁹ nor subsequent promises to pay such notes¹⁰ add to their validity. The maker may estop himself, however, from setting up the illegality of such note against an assignee.¹¹ The indorsement of a valid instrument to pay a gambling debt is invalid and passes no title.¹² Subsequent bona fide indorseees of a negotiable instrument which was originally given or indorsed on a wager or gambling consideration may recover from prior indorsers,¹³ until the party is reached who gave the instrument on a gambling consideration. No recovery from him can be had.¹⁴ Thus an acceptor who was obliged to pay an indorsee cannot recover from the drawer of a bill drawn in payment of a gaming debt.¹⁵ If the bank pays a check given for a gambling debt without notice of such fact it may credit such check on the account of the maker; but if the bank pays with notice, it is liable to the maker as if such check had never been given.¹⁶ A statute which makes "gambling" notes void in the hands of a bona fide holder does not avoid other wager contracts as notes for future wager sales.¹⁷ By statute in some jurisdictions where a check for gambling is void, a check issued for a loan of money, which money the payee then wins from the maker is void.¹⁸

If a negotiable instrument is given pursuant to a usurious contract, the defense of usury may be interposed as against the original payee, and all claiming under him other than bona fide holders for value. Whether usury can be interposed as a defense against a bona fide holder for value is a question upon which there is a conflict of authority, due in part to the wording of the local statutes. In some jurisdictions it is held that the defense of usury may be set up, even as against a bona fide holder for value.¹ This result is reached partly through construing the word "void" in the usury statutes making notes on usurious consideration "void"; and partly through the specific terms of certain local statutes. In other jurisdictions it is held that the defense of usury can not be made as against a bona fide holder for value.² This result is reached, partly by construing "void" as meaning "voidable," and partly by specific provisions of local statutes. In such jurisdictions, as is said elsewhere, the debtor has the right to recover from the original payee the difference between the amount which he is obliged to pay under such contract to the bona fide holder and the amount which the payee might have recovered from the debtor.³

So unwilling are courts to enforce illegal contracts that they may, under proper circumstances, dismiss actions thereon of their own motion, though illegality is not pleaded as a defense.¹ The parties cannot impose upon the court the duty of deciding rights arising out of an illegal contract by omitting to call the court's attention to the illegality,² nor can they waive such defense.³ There is, however, some confusion about the limits of the power of the court to dismiss an action or give a peremptory instruction for the defendant or to admit evidence of illegality, where illegality has not been pleaded but is disclosed by the evidence admitted or offered. At Common Law under the general issue any defense might be interposed which showed that plaintiff never had any claim; and under this rule illegality, though not pleaded as a defense, might be interposed to defeat plaintiff's claim.⁴ Thus where a license was required by law, an action by an unlicensed broker⁵ or an unlicensed liquor dealer⁶ might be defeated by showing that no license had been taken out, under the general issue. This Common Law rule applied where plaintiff could make out his case without resorting to the illegal transaction, and defendant sought to introduce evidence of such facts as an affirmative defense.⁷ Many other defenses besides illegality might be interposed under the general issue—the rule in question not being in any way peculiar to illegality. However, the old Common Law rules of pleading have been greatly modified in many states, by statute or by rules of court, largely in order to restrict the broad range of the general issue. Defendants, under the new procedure, are required to plead or to give notice of the facts on which they mean to rely, and this requires them to plead the facts which made the contract illegal, if they wish to introduce affirmative evidence thereof.⁸ Illegality will not ordinarily be presumed.⁹ Thus an action on a contract dated on a secular day cannot be defeated by showing that it was entered into on Sunday, unless defendant has alleged that fact in his answer.¹⁰ So an action on a contract for the sale of a stock of goods cannot be defeated by evidence showing that part of such stock was liquor sold contrary to law, where such fact was not pleaded.¹¹ There is an important qualification to the modern statutory rule. If plaintiff discloses the illegality of the contract, either by pleading it in such form as to disclose its illegality,¹² or in the opening statements of counsel to the jury setting forth the facts,¹³ or in plaintiff's evidence to make out

⁷ It was "not necessary to the plaintiff's recovery in that case that he should have proved that he had license, for that might have been presumed, but the fact that he had not license appeared on cross-examination; hence he lost his case." *Johnson v. tem of pleading, or even by the express stipulation of the parties." Oscanyan v. Arms Co., 103 U. S. 261, 267.

¹⁵ In Clafin v. Credit System Co., 165 Mass. 501; 52 Am. St. Rep. 528; 43 N. E. 293, C sued the C. S. Company on a policy of insurance against bad accounts. The report of the case does not show what defense was interposed; but it was not alleged that defendant had not complied with the Massachusetts statutes concerning insurance, which statutes made it "unlawful" to insure except in compliance with such statute. There was no authority in such statutes for insurance of credits or accounts; and while it appeared that defendant was a foreign insurance company, it did not appear from the record that it had been admitted to transact business in Massachusetts, nor on the other hand did it appear that it had not been admitted. The court said: "The illegality of the contract is not set up in defense, nor was it noticed in the superior court, where the plaintiff had a verdict. But no court will consciously lend its aid for the enforcement of an illegal contract. Snell v. Dwight, 120 Mass. 9; Dunham v. Presby, 120 Mass. 285; Riley v. Jordan, 122 Mass. 231, 233; Low v. Peers, Wilm. 364, 378. In the present case, the question was brought to the attention of counsel by the court at the argument, and since the argument, counsel have been given an opportunity to argue it upon briefs and have declined or omitted so to do. . . . In our view of the case, the questions argued by the parties are immaterial to the decision of the case and need not be discussed." 165 Mass. 503. The court treated the contract as illegal, both on its face, as credit insurance, and also by reason of extrinsic facts, the omission to show that the corporation was authorized to do business in the state.

such cases the theory has been advanced that it is optional with the trial court whether it will hear or dismiss the action.¹⁸ Some cases which seem to uphold the right of defendant to prove illegality without alleging it, under modern procedure, can be explained on other grounds. Thus where A lent B money, taking a note and mortgage, and to avoid taxation and in part as payment of a debt, A indorsed the note to X, A's father, a non-resident, without delivering the note to him, suit in X's name by A was not allowed, though B made no allegation that the transfer to X was illegal, in avoiding taxation. But the assignment had to be proved as part of plaintiff's case; and is when the contract is offered in evidence in support of the allegations of the petition and its illegality appears on its face relief should be denied, whatever the condition of the pleadings. The same is true where the plaintiff can only make out his case through the medium of an illegal transaction to which he himself is a party. Hence the common statement of the courts that 'if it appear from plaintiff's own showing that the contract arises from an immoral cause, or a transgression of a positive law, the court will at once refuse its assistance.' But when the illegality does not appear from the contract itself, or from the evidence necessary to prove it, but depends on extraneous facts, the defense is new matter, and must be pleaded in order to be available." McDearmott v. Sedgwick, 140 Mo. 172, 182; 39 S. W. 776. (Citing St. Louis, etc., Association v. Delano, 108 Mo. 217; 18 S. W. 1101; Musser v. Adler, 86 Mo. 445; Moore v. Ringo, 82 Mo. 468; *Sybert v. ¹⁸ "In such an action a defendant who has not pleaded illegality in the contract sued on has no right to offer evidence of such illegality, or even to avail himself of it when disclosed in the plaintiff's testimony, if the court does not refuse to entertain the case. . . . But no waiver by the defendant or consent of parties can oblige a court of justice to try or enforce a claim which upon the plaintiff's own showing has no foundation in law." Cardoze v. Smith, 113 Mass. 250, 252. (In this case plaintiff's own evidence showed that the contract was a Sunday contract; and the court instructed the jury that if plaintiff's evidence showed that the contract was a Sunday contract they should find for the defendant, though he had not pleaded such defense. The Supreme Court sustained the trial court.)

Equity does not, in general, give relief to either party to an illegal executory contract if they are in pari delicto.¹ There are, however, many cases in which equity has interfered on the theory that the public interest will be subserved better by preventing either party from enforcing such contract.² Equity will not attempt to prevent persons who wish to do so from entering into wager or gambling contracts, but leaves such matters to the preventive power of the criminal law.³ Even a stockholder in a fair association cannot enjoin it from allowing gambling on its grounds without showing that his stock is depreciated thereby.⁴ After a wager has been made, the jurisdiction of equity is often invoked to enjoin the winner from enforcing it. Where special facts call for the exercise of the powers of equity, the courts differ as to the propriety of interfering in wagers. Some courts treat the statutes against wagers as framed for the public good, to prevent wagers, without regard to the merits of the parties. Such courts restrain the enforcement of wager contracts by injunction,⁵ even after they have been reduced to judgment.⁶ This power is usually assumed under statutes which make even judgments void if on gambling consideration.⁷ Under a statute specifically giving equity power to grant relief against judgments rendered on gambling contracts, equity will enjoin the collection of a judgment rendered on a lease of realty to be used for gambling, but will not decree repayment of money paid on prior judgments.⁸

Other courts look on these statutes as framed for the benefit of the loser, and accordingly refuse equitable relief to the loser on the ground that he does not come into equity with clean hands, and that such remedy as the statute gives him is at law.⁹ Where this theory is adopted injunctions against enforcing judgments based on wager contracts are refused.¹⁰ Equity will not enforce a foreign judgment rendered on a wager contract.¹¹

Equity will not give preventive relief against a contract to stifle criminal prosecution.¹² If a mortgage is given under such a contract it cannot be foreclosed,¹³ and on the other hand equity will not cancel it.¹⁴ Where ejectment can be brought on a mortgage it seems that it is no defense that such mortgage was given to stifle prosecution,¹⁵ and equity will not enjoin the grantee from proceeding to enforce such mortgage by ejectment.¹⁶ So if a note is given on such a consideration, equity will not order it delivered up and cancelled,¹⁷ especially if it is overdue.¹⁸ Equity has given preventive relief against contracts to procure appointment to public office.¹⁹ Equity will give no relief against a contract for the sale of property forbidden by law to be sold.²⁰

If the contract is performed equity will not, in the absence of statute, extend its aid to undo what the parties have voluntarily done.²¹ Thus equity will not set aside a deed given on illegal consideration,²² as to defraud the grantor's creditors²³ or other parties,²⁴ or on a gambling consideration.²⁵

If the parties are not in pari delicto,²⁶ as where the party seeking relief was subjected to duress,²⁷ equity will grant relief.

RIGHTS ARISING ON PERFORMANCE OF ILLEGAL CONTRACT.

§519. Effect of performance of illegal contract.

If both parties to an illegal contract are in equal fault and one of them has performed in whole or in part, he cannot at Common Law, avoid the contract and recover from the adversary party a reasonable compensation for such performance.¹ No rights, therefore, arise out of an illegal transaction, even on the theory of constructive contracts.² The law leaves the parties to illegal contracts where it finds them and gives them no assistance in extricating themselves from the situation in which they have placed themselves.³ A surety who with full knowl-

While parties to an illegal contract cannot at Common Law recover what they may have parted with thereunder, there are three general classes of cases not included in this rule: (1) when such recovery is specifically allowed by statute, (2) when the parties are not in pari delicto, and (3) when the law allows one party to repent before the illegal purpose is accomplished, and to recover what he has parted with — known as the doctrine of locus pœnitentiæ. In some classes of contracts, the legislature has provided, as the most effective way of discouraging such contracts, that parties thereto may recover what they have parted with thereunder.¹ In the absence of special statute the loser who has voluntarily paid in money or property under a wager contract cannot recover the same.² But one whose money has been taken by an agent without authority and deposited as margin in future gambling sales may recover it in equity from such broker.³ In order to discourage wager contracts, statutes have been passed in almost all American and English jurisdictions, allowing the loser who has paid his loss to recover the same.⁴ Unless the statute provides for it, interest on the money paid in cannot be recovered.⁵ Such statutes are held in some jurisdictions to impose penalties,⁶ in others, not.⁷ They are usually rather strictly construed. Thus statutes allowing one who loses betting on a "game" to recover from the winner, does not apply to other wagers.⁸ Under such statutes no recovery can be had of money lost on future gambling contracts.⁹ Under such a statute, a bet lost on a wrestling match may be recovered.¹⁰ But statutes allowing such recovery in wagers and bets generally, apply to future wager sales without specifically mentioning them.¹¹ Under such statute allowing recovery of money lost on a bet or wager money lost on a bet on a primary election can be recovered.¹² Under a statute allowing recovery of margins from one employed to buy or sell in future wagers on prices, one who buys stocks on margin as an accommodation, without compensation, is not "employed," and such margins cannot be recovered from him.¹³ Persons associated in partnership with the person actually receiving the money from the payment.⁹ Under the doctrine of application of payments, in force in most jurisdictions, payments are to be applied to the principal and lawful interest, even if the parties have agreed that it shall apply upon usurious interest. Accordingly no recovery can be had for payments of usurious interest until the amount paid in exceeds the amount lawfully due.¹⁰ The statutes which give a right to recover usurious interest, generally fix a short period of limitations for bringing such action. At the expiration of such period no action will lie.¹¹ Hence in an action brought to recover usury paid in, no recovery can be had for interest paid at a more remote time before the commencement of the action than that fixed by statute.¹² In other states the statutes against usury give only the remedy of forfeiture of executory agreements for usurious interest, or the application of payments made and the part of the original debt remaining unpaid. Under such statutes, after payment of the entire debt, usurious interest paid cannot be recovered;¹³ except that by some statutes the debtor may recover usurious interest where the creditor has assigned a negotiable instrument given by the debtor to a bona fide purchaser in whose hands, by the local law, such instrument is free from the defense of usury.¹⁴

The statute of the United States which provides for the regulation of national banks, provides for the recovery of the penalty from the national bank which receives usurious interest by the person paying the same, or by his legal representatives, of twice the amount of the usury thus paid.¹ This statute applies to payments by an artificial person, as well as by a natural person.² Under this statute, since only the interest paid may be recovered,³ including usurious interest in the principal in a renewal note,⁴ or charging it in a running account,⁵ or deducting it in advance,⁶ is not payment within the meaning of the statute, and the creditor's remedy is to resist payment of so much of the unpaid debt as exceeds the principal advanced. So if the paper of the party primarily liable is discounted by the national bank at a rate of interest exceeding the maximum legal rate, the mere act of deducting the usurious discount, and placing the balance to the credit of such debtor is not a payment of usurious interest.⁷ Even though "usurious interest has been 'reserved' at the time of the loan or discount there recovery of usurious payments.¹⁶ The decision of the United States Supreme Court upon this subject¹⁷ must be considered as final. The United States statute provides for the recovery of "twice the amount of interest paid." This has been held to mean twice the amount of all the interest paid, and not merely twice the amount of the excess of the interest paid over the legal interest,¹⁸ since, under the federal statute, no lawful interest can in such cases be exacted; and the statute provides that "in case the greater rate of interest has been paid . . ." twice the amount of interest thus paid "may be recovered."¹⁹

The effect of payments which by the agreement of debtor and creditor are to be applied in discharge of usurious interest depends to a very great extent upon the specific provisions of the usury statute which controls the transaction. In many states the rule is that such payments are in spite of the agreement of the parties, to be applied to that part of the debt which is lawfully due. Thus if any interest is lawfully due, such payments are to be applied first to such interest and then to the principal.¹ Hence on the one hand if the usurious interest exacted equals or exceeds all the interest lawfully due, a foreclosure suit for an installment of interest in default is premature.² If the amount paid as usurious interest does not exceed the amount of lawful interest due, such payment cannot be applied to the principal.³ So, on the other hand, the creditor must in an accounting allow all payments in excess of lawful interest, if any interest is lawful, and if not, all payments whatever, as credits upon the principal.⁴ Hence when the borrower has repaid the entire sum actually advanced, with lawful interest thereon, he is entitled to have the note and mortgage given by him for such debt returned as paid.⁵ In such case no tender of any amount by the debtor is necessary.⁶ So a surety who has paid usurious interest may treat it as applied on the lawful interest and principal for the purpose of enforcing contribution from the other sureties.⁷ If a note on which different persons are liable is renewed by two notes of equal amounts with different sets of makers, one set is entitled to have credited upon their note one-half of the total amount of usurious interest paid on the original note.⁸ Usurious interest paid on one note cannot be treated as applied to another,⁹ nor can it be set off against such other after the time for bringing suit to recover such payment has elapsed.¹⁰ In some states the right to have payments of usurious interest applied to the lawful interest or to the principal is looked upon as co-extensive with the statutory right to sue for the recovery of usurious interest, and as governed by the same restrictions.¹¹ In these states application of such payments to the principal can be made during the time that suit for the recovery of usurious interest could be brought,¹² but not afterward.¹³ This is rather the exercise of the right of set-off than true application of payments. It is indeed termed set-off.¹⁴ A purely defensive pleading cannot be the means of recovering such usurious interest, as in case of true application of payments; but affirmative relief must be sought by a pleading in the nature of a cross-petition.¹⁵ In some states the effect of the statute is limited to defeat executory contracts for usurious, and the right to apply such payments is denied.¹⁶

The debtor who has paid usurious interest may, of course, recover it, wherever such recovery is allowed at all. The assignee of a lawful contract may recover usurious interest exacted from him by the creditor and paid by him.¹ Under the statute of the United States controlling national banks, an assignee under a general assignment may recover twice the amount of the interest paid.² So the right to recover interest passes to an assignee in insolvency or bankruptcy.³ Under some of the state statutes which do not extend any right of recovery in terms to the executor or administrator of the debtor, the right to recover usurious interest paid, does not survive,⁴ and the executor cannot recover.⁵ If the usury is not paid until after the debtor's death, his administrator or executor can recover it.⁶ The right to recover usury is held, in some states, to be assignable generally. The assignor need not be joined in such action.⁷ A trustee who has borrowed money at usurious interest to purchase a mortgage upon trust property for its protection, and assigns such mortgage to the creditor as security, cannot recover usury paid upon such debt, where the beneficiaries of the trust have reimbursed him for the amount of his own funds advanced for this purpose.⁸ A surety cannot recover usurious interest paid by his principal, nor can he have it applied upon his liability.⁹ Another creditor of the same debtor cannot recover usurious interest paid by his debtor.¹⁰ The creditor who received the usurious interest is liable therefor. If the debtor borrows money from a third person acting in good faith, with which to take up the usurious debt, he cannot recover from such third person the amount of the usury thus paid.¹¹ This is true, even if the two sets of creditors are closely related, as long as the transaction is in fact a loan, and not a cover for a renewal.¹²

If the parties to the contract are not in equal fault the maxim in pari delicto has no application. If A, by mistake, misrepresentation or fraud, is misled as to some material fact and for this reason does not know that the contract into which he is entering is illegal, he is not in pari delicto with the adversary party.¹ Thus one who by a false representation that the British government had authorized the invasion of the South African republic was induced to take part in Dr. Jameson's raid could recover damages for wounds, loss of time and the like.² So if A employs X to make a contract with B and pays him a commission A may recover such commission on subsequently learning that X was also in B's employment.³

In applying this rule foreign law is treated as a fact⁴ and so is the schedule of rates of the Interstate Commerce Commission.⁵ But if A knows the material facts he is in pari delicto even though by reason of his ignorance of domestic law he did not know that the contract was illegal.⁶ If a party to the contract knows the material facts, and is under no restraint, breach of the contract by the adversary party, however fraudulent his conduct, does not prevent the former party from being in pari delicto. If A enters into an illegal contract with B to defraud X, A can have no relief against B for fraudulently seizing and converting to his own use the proceeds of the fraud on X.⁷ If a statute requires one party to a given kind of contract to do certain things for the benefit of the other party thereto omission of such things by the first party does not put the second party in pari delicto.⁸ Thus the vendee of a patent right under a contract of sale, the statutory requirements whereof, imposed for the vendee's protection, have been omitted, is not in pari delicto with the vendor and may rescind.⁹ If the agents of a public corporation make unauthorized loans of public money, contrary to statute, the contract of loan is itself illegal, but the public corporation is not in pari delicto and may recover the money loaned.¹⁰ A statute may impose a penalty on a vendor, without imposing any corresponding penalty on vendee. In such cases, while the contract of sale is not valid, the vendee is not in pari delicto and if he has not obtained title and possession of the property contracted for he may rescind and recover what he has paid in.¹¹ against the weight of authority on the particular questions decided,¹³ and others may be decided without invoking this distinction. The cases discussed later in this section often involve the commission of some act involving moral turpitude, yet relief is given when the parties are not in pari delicto.

If one party is subject to undue influence he cannot be said to be in pari delicto.¹⁴ "A court of equity will interfere and go to the relief of the less guilty party, whose transgression has been brought about by the imposition, undue influence, etc., of the party on whom the burden of the original blameworthiness principally rests."¹⁵ A woman who has paid money into a matrimonial bureau on a marriage brocage contract is not as a matter of law so in pari delicto that she cannot recover the same.¹⁶ So where B's attorney, A, induced B to make a transfer of B's property to A to defeat the claims of creditors of B's father against such property, B is not so in pari delicto that he cannot enforce A's promise to reconvey.¹⁷

If A is, by duress exercised on him by B, induced to enter into a contract with B which is illegal, A is not at fault equally with B and he may recover what he has parted with under such contract.¹⁸ Thus money or property extorted by B from

A by means of duress may be recovered though it was delivered to stifle criminal prosecution.¹⁹

The third exception to the general rule that no recovery can be had by either party to an illegal contract, either on the contract or to recover what he has paid thereunder, exists where the law allows a party to repudiate an illegal contract before the illegal purpose is accomplished, and to recover what he has parted with thereunder.¹

The common application of the doctrine of locus pœnitentiæ is found where A intends to make an illegal contract with B, and as a step in that direction deposits a thing of value with X, A's agent or bailee, to be by him thereafter delivered to B under the illegal contract. In such case, unless the mere delivery of the property to X accomplished the illegal purpose, A can recover the property from X at any time before, under previous and unrevoked instructions, he has delivered it to B. Thus one who has placed money in the hands of a stakeholder to abide the result of a wager can recover it,² even where the depositor meant to cheat the other party to the wager.³ So where A puts money in the hands of his agent for betting,⁴ or bribing public officials,⁵ he can recover it from them before it has been so used. So where A pays B money to be used for the benefit of the poor, in order to stifle a criminal prosecution,⁶ or deposits money in a bank to be used in obtaining a pardon for X,⁷ he can recover before the money is thus expended.

Where the thing of value to use in an illegal contract between A and B is not put into the hands of a third person such as X, A's agent or bailee, but is paid by A to B, there is some conflict of authority as to whether the doctrine of locus pœnitentiæ has any application. Some authorities allow recovery of what has been paid in under an illegal contract if it is legal on its face, made illegal only by extrinsic facts, not malum in se and for the most part unexecuted.⁸ Expressions in the opinions of courts seem to extend this doctrine over a very wide range.⁹ Other courts refuse to recognize the right of one party to a contract to recover property paid by him to the adversary party under an illegal contract if both are in pari delicto and no statute provides for a recovery,¹⁰ at least when the contract has been performed in part.¹¹

CONTRACTS COLLATERAL TO ILLEGAL CONTRACT.

A contract may be so closely connected with an illegal contract or transaction as to be itself invalid. On the other hand, though entered into by one party at least for the object of promoting some unlawful object indirectly and collaterally, it may be so far removed from the unlawful object as to be itself legal.¹ What the test is for determining whether the collateral contract is itself legal or illegal, is a question upon which there is some conflict in decisions and more in dicta. It is often said that if the contract concerning which the question is raised is so connected with the illegal transaction that the party suing thereon cannot make out a prima facie case without disclosing the illegality, the contract is itself unenforceable, but that otherwise it is not invalid on account of such connection.² This rule is undoubtedly correct as far as it refers to the nature of the facts upon which plaintiff bases his recovery. If the illegal transaction is in no way necessary to establish plaintiff's right to recover, it cannot be invoked to defeat such recovery. Thus the illegality of a lease of property in the Indian Territory cannot be invoked to prevent the lessor from regaining possession when the lease expires.³ This is, however, an unfortunate way of stating a generally sound proposition, as it makes the form in which plaintiff states the case and his success in suppressing the illegality in presenting it to court or jury that determines his right to recover. A safer and more accurate form of stating this rule is that "The test of a violation of rules of public policy is whether the plaintiff requires the aid of the illegal transaction to establish his right."⁴ It is not the question of the form in which plaintiff states his case or the judicious selection of evidence which he makes that determines his right to recover, but of the essential facts on which the plaintiff bases his case whether he wishes to disclose such facts in their entirety or not. Thus A conveyed realty to B, taking notes for the purchase price. A's motive in making such conveyance was to leave the state with her son and her husband to keep them from criminal prosecution for felony. B then conveyed to her parents X and Y to defraud B's creditors. A then sued B on the notes and obtained judgment. A then sued X and Y to have such conveyance set aside. It was held that A could maintain such action, as her right to recover was based on her judgment and not on the original transaction.⁵

Bennett*, 43 N. Y. 273; 3 Am. Rep. 706; Oliphant v. Markham, 79 Tex. 543; 23 Am. St. Rep. 363; 15 S. W. 569; Buck v. Albee, 26 Vt. 184; 62 Am. Dec. 564; Hardy v. Stonebraker, 31 Wis. 640.

² Farmer v. Russell, 1 Bos. & P. 296; Simpson v. Bloss, 7 Taunt. 246; Phalen v. Clark, 19 Conn. 421; 50 Am. Dec. 253; Clarke v. Brown, 77 Ga. 606; 4 Am. St. Rep. 98; Ingram v. Mitchell, 30 Ga. 547; Barwick v. Moyse, 74 Miss. 415; 60 Am. St. Rep. 512; 21 So. 238; Snider v. Woodenware Co., 74 Miss.

If A does not in fact know of B's unlawful intent, though he had reason to believe that such intent existed, the courts are practically unanimous in holding that the contract between A and B is valid.¹ If A sells liquor to B and B knows that he has not paid his tax and filed his bond, which by law are conditions precedent to his engaging in such traffic, but A does not know of such omission, A can recover from B for liquors sold, but B cannot set off damages for A's breach of a covenant to give B the exclusive sale of liquor manufactured by A.² If A enters into a contract which appears to be a lawful one, not knowing of the unlawful intent of B, A may enforce such contract.³ So a sale of property by one who does not know to what use it is to be put is valid, even though it is used for wagering or gambling.⁴ But if it is made a crime to have possession of a gambling machine no recovery can be had for a sale thereof.⁵ So a contract for the sale of property to a monopoly is valid at the suit of the vendor, where he did not know that vendee was forming a monopoly.⁶

If a contract collateral to an illegal act requires by its terms that one of the parties thereto shall perform the illegal act, such contract is unenforceable.¹ Thus if A sells intoxicating liquor to B under a contract whereby B is to resell the same in a manner contrary to law, the contract between A and B is illegal.² No recovery can be had for intoxicating liquors sold to a vendee who has no license to sell the same under a contract requiring the vendee to resell the same,³ even where such unlawful sale is disguised by the pretense that vendee is operating a bottling department for his vendor who is licensed.⁴ So no recovery can be had on an entire contract whereby a brewing company lends money to one to start an unlawful saloon and he agrees to buy beer exclusively of the brewing company.⁵ A contract, the consideration whereof is to be paid in illegal warrants, is void.⁶ So if the contract requires use of the property in illegal wagering or gambling no recovery can be had on such contract of sale.⁷ Thus notes given for a dice-throwing machine for gambling were held void in the hands of a bona fide holder, it appearing that, as part of the sale, vendor put the machines up, showed vendee how to work them and posted a reward for the apprehension of anyone robbing or tampering with them;⁸ and a sale of privileges on a race-course, including "betting booths" is unenforceable.⁹ But after the lessee has enjoyed such privileges for a time and paid for them he cannot recover payments so made.¹⁰ So a sale of lots to several vendees, who were by the contract of sale to determine by lot which tract each should receive, a chance for a prize lot being thrown in,¹¹ or a sale of land to be used in a lottery,¹²

The plaintiff's race track and grandstand were lawful to be kept, but when it adds to those the gambling booth, and runs them together, and then makes a contract that is appurtenant to either and appurtenant to both, courts will not entertain it merely because in its application it was not limited entirely to the unlawful purpose."

are both illegal. So if a contract of loan obliges the borrower to use it in wagering, and such wagers are illegal,¹³ as where the lender is to be paid out of the profits of the wager,¹⁴ or where the lender acts as banker for the parties who are gambling,¹⁵ such contract of loan is illegal and no recovery can be had thereon. Thus where men working in A's lumber camp wished to gamble at poker, and had no money, and A agreed to allow the winners to draw goods up to the amounts of their winnings and charge them to the loser, which was done, it was held that A could not deduct from the wages of the losers the amounts thus paid by him to the winners.¹⁶ So a note given to secure the payee for margins advanced by him is invalid in future wagering sales.¹⁷ In some jurisdictions by statute a promise to repay money lent at the time and for the purpose of

any game is void.¹⁸ But such statute does not invalidate a loan by A to B, which money B means to use to start a gambling house.¹⁹ So where A cashes B's certificate of deposit, knowing that B intends to use the proceeds in gaming, it is not lending money at the time of the play, within the meaning of the statute.²⁰ If A loses to B at gaming, and pays, and A at once borrows it from B and gives his note therefor, such note is invalid.²¹

If A agrees with B to do an act in itself lawful, though intended by B to aid in some illegal transaction, and A agrees as part of such contract to do some other and further act in aid of B's unlawful purpose, the entire contract is illegal.¹ Thus a contract to lease premises for the illegal sale of liquor, the landlord to supply the ice necessary in such business;² a contract for the lawful sale of liquor, whereby the vendor is to conceal the character of the property by the form of shipment, and furnish false invoices to enable vendee to commit perjury successfully;³ or any sale where by false marking,⁴ or packing⁵ vendee is aided in escaping detection in his violation of the law;⁶ or a sale of candy put up in prize packages to use in an unlawful lottery⁷ are all invalid. Thus contracts which tend directly to promote illegal wagers are unenforceable.⁸ It has, however, been held that the mere doing of an act to aid the adversary party to violate the law does not make the entire transaction illegal unless the doing of such act was required by the contract.⁹ Thus shipping intoxicating liquors in "fake" barrels¹⁰ or in plain boxes¹¹ has been held not to make the contract of sale necessarily illegal.

If a contract is entered into between A and B, and B intends thereby to aid in perpetrating a crime of great magnitude, the mere knowledge on A's part of B's unlawful intention makes such contract unenforceable. decisions in cases of this class involve the crime of treason.¹ Thus A's sale of property to B, knowing that B means to employ it in aid of a rebellion, is illegal.² To make a contract of this sort illegal it must at least appear that the one party knew of the purpose of the other to make such use of the property. Thus a loan of money to a general in an army engaged in rebellion is not invalid where it does not appear that any use was to be made or was made thereof in aiding the rebellion.³ Where the action is not on the contract, but for conversion in disregard of the contract, recovery is allowed even if the illegal purpose was known.⁴ If the sale is compulsory and in reality is a conversion the vendor can recover.⁵

that B means to resell the same unlawfully, the contract is valid if A has done nothing further to aid such unlawful purpose.⁵ A contract to sell ice is not rendered invalid because the vendee intends to sell such ice to persons who sell liquor contrary to law.⁶ So a contract to lease property is not rendered illegal by lessor's knowledge that lessee means to use the dining room for the illegal sale of liquor on Sunday.⁷ So A can recover for painting a bar-room for B, though A knows that B means to sell liquor therein unlawfully.⁸ So where A acts as B's agent to place a loan, and takes a deed to secure the loan, which is a mortgage in equity, A can recover for his services though A knew that B's object in taking such form of security was to avoid taxation.⁹ So if the vendor knows that vendee will use the thing sold in a wager, but the contract of sale does not require such use, the contract of sale is valid¹⁰ as where A takes notes for an interest in a race-horse, which the vendees mean to use in racing for money illegally;¹¹ or A sells lottery tickets to B where such sale is legal, knowing that B will resell them where invalid.²⁰ If A sells intoxicating liquor to B knowing that B means to resell it unlawfully,²¹ or if A sells drugs to B knowing that B meant to use them in beer unlawfully,²² such contracts are invalid. On this theory no recovery can be had on a bond for rent for premises on which lessor knew that lessee meant to sell liquor unlawfully.²³ By statute, in some jurisdictions, no recovery can be had for rent for premises which lessor knew were used for illegal gambling.²⁴ Such a provision includes a lease of land for horse-racing and betting thereon.²⁵ So A cannot recover from B for building a nine-pin alley where the use of the building for that purpose is unlawful.²⁶ So where a machine sold can be used only for gambling it has been held that the price cannot be recovered in a sale on credit.²⁷ So it has been held that one who rides on a railway under a contract to transport him to Johnston's army to serve against the United States,²⁸ or an illegal pass,²⁹ cannot recover for injuries suffered during such transportation by reason of the negligence of the carrier.

In other cases a position is taken intermediate to these extremes. Thus A's knowledge is said to be a fact for the jury tending to show A's participation in B's illegal plan.³⁰

In other cases the test of the legality of the contract between A and B is said to be whether A not only knows of B's unlawful intent but desires to help him to his end.³¹

A contract which tends to aid unlawful intercourse is always invalid;¹ but the practical difficulty in these cases arises over what contracts do, in fact, aid unlawful intercourse. A lease of property knowing that it is to be used for purposes of prostitution has been held illegal;² and no accounting will be had arising out of a partnership for letting rooms for prostitution, even if such rooms are in a part of the city chiefly devoted to such purposes,³ nor can recovery be had for board and lodging furnished

If the buyer knows that the seller, while aware of his intent, is indifferent to it or disapproves of it, it may be doubtful whether the connection is sufficient." Citing *Webster v. to enable a woman to lead a life of prostitution,⁴ nor for carriage hire for such purpose.⁵ No recovery can be had for money paid under a contract, to enable one of the parties to operate a house of prostitution.⁶ A sale of realty, on the other hand, is valid though the vendor knows that the vendee means to use it for purposes of prostitution,⁷ or as a residence for his mistress,⁸ as long as such use is not an essential feature of the contract of sale. A sale of furniture to fit out a house of prostitution has been held valid where such use was not required by the contract of sale.⁹ Courts differ as to the effect of such a sale of furniture, however, and some authorities hold such a sale invalid including a promise to pay for such furniture,¹⁰ especially where vendor reserves title to himself until payment, knowing that in the meanwhile it is to be used for immoral purposes.¹¹ In any event if the vendor does not know that furniture sold is to be used in furnishing a house of prostitution he may recover though he had knowledge of facts sufficient to put him on inquiry.¹² A sale of beer to the keeper of a house of prostitution has been held valid so that the vendor can recover, though

If a debtor under a usurious contract borrows money from a third person in order to pay the usurious debt in full, such third person may recover from such debtor the amount of the loan, even though applied upon the usurious debt, and though the lender has full knowledge of such facts.¹ The lender may even be the president of a loan association which is the original creditor.² The debtor may even borrow from the creditor to the usurious contract, and apply the proceeds of the loan in discharging a usurious debt, as long as this is not "merely colorable and designed as a cloak to cover up usury."³ To make such a loan free from usury, however, the borrower must be perfectly free under the contract of the loan to apply the proceeds as he pleases. If the transaction requires the borrower to apply the proceeds to the discharge of the usurious debt, this is not a new loan, but a renewal of the usurious contract.⁴

The question of the validity of securities given to secure usurious debts depends to a large extent upon the wording and construction of local statutes. The security is treated as merely collateral to the usurious debt. Accordingly, the holder of the security cannot enforce it for any amount greater than that lawfully due upon the usurious contract.¹ In jurisdictions where securities are not negotiable, the assignee of a security for usurious debt cannot enforce it for more than the amount that is lawfully due upon the usurious contract.² Whether the security for the usurious debt has any validity, depends largely upon local statute. In the absence of a specific statute, such security is valid up to the amount legally due upon the usurious contract.³ Hence, if security is given for two debts, one of which is usurious and the other not, it will be enforceable at least up to the amount of the debt which is not usurious.⁴ Conversely, since a mortgage securing a usurious debt is not totally void, a mortgagor may maintain an action under a statute providing for a penalty in case the mortgagee refuses to release the mortgage after payment or tender of the amount of the debt, provided the mortgagor has tendered the amount lawfully due.⁵ By a statute in some jurisdictions, securities for usurious debts are totally void.⁶ This statute applies to mortgages of realty,⁷ chattel mortgages,⁸ and pledges of personal property.⁹ In some jurisdictions, while mortgages are valid though given to secure usurious debts, conveyances to secure or pay usurious debts are by statute void.¹⁰

action between partners can be maintained on a partnership agreement to make wagers with a third person,² as to buy lottery tickets.³ Neither money advanced,⁴ profits made,⁵ nor losses paid,⁶ can be recovered; nor can an accounting be had.⁷ If one partner converts to his own use money furnished to use in bribing public officials no recovery can be had.⁸ No recovery can be had on a contract of partnership which is in effect a monopoly contract.⁹

In some jurisdictions, however, it is laid down as a general principle that one who receives property to another's use cannot thereafter avoid liability to such other on the ground that the original transaction was illegal.¹⁰ Under the latter theory some courts have held that A cannot interpose the defense of illegality

Under the principles already given,¹ if A makes an illegal contract with B, and under such contract B voluntarily pays X as agent of A, there is much authority for holding that A can recover such payment from X, and that X cannot in such action set up the illegality of the original contract.² Thus in contracts

So an agent cannot retain property of his principal and refuse to account therefor under the claim that it is used in a monopoly.⁷ So the agent of a foreign express company which has not complied with statutes which prescribe on what terms it may do business in the state is liable to such company for money received on its account, though his bond is held to be illegal.⁸ Thus where a draft, representing the winnings of lottery tickets was sent to a bank, the payee thereof and such bank agreed with the other parties having an interest in the winnings of such tickets to cash the draft and divide the proceeds among the parties interested, the bank on cashing the draft is liable on such promise.⁹ Where A employed B to sell lottery tickets contrary to law, and B sold some and collected the money and C also sold some and paid the money over to B, it was held that A could recover from B the money paid in by C, but not the money received by B for tickets sold by himself.¹⁰ If the agent has paid over the profits to the winner, his principal, and has the original deposit left, he is clearly liable to the principal therefor.¹¹ There is, however, some authority for holding that the agent cannot be compelled to account to his principal, on the ground that the principal cannot show title to the property in question without setting up the illegal contract, and the law will not allow him to use this to make out his case.¹² Thus if an agent has collected rent for land located in a jurisdiction in which by statute the principal's possession was illegal, the principal cannot recover from the agent.¹³

If the agent has made advances to his principal or rendered services to him under the illegal contract, his right to recover turns on whether or not the agent knew the facts which made the contract illegal. If he did, he cannot recover;¹⁴ but if he did not, he can.¹⁵ So in wager contracts, the agent may recover his commissions, wages and advances, if he does not know of his principal's illegal intent,¹⁶ and his principal cannot recover money paid to the agent for advances, and services, or on margin and the like, even under a statute giving the loser a right to recover.¹⁷ If the agent knows that the contracts which he is making are wagers, his right to recover depends on whether such wager contracts are treated as illegal, or as merely void. If the wager is illegal as well as void, the agent cannot recover for services or advances, since, properly speaking, there is no agency in illegal acts but all are joint wrong-doers.¹⁸ If the wager is illegal, and the principal loses, the question of his right to recover margins and advances from the agent depends further on the question whether the statute allowing a loser to recover is so framed as to include the contract in question. If it does, the principal can recover from the agent;¹⁹ otherwise not.²⁰ So if the principal puts money²¹ or property²² into his agent's hands for an illegal purpose, the agent must account for any unexpended surplus.²³ Thus where A as accountant of an organization for operating a disguised gambling scheme receives money from its members, he must account therefor.²⁴ If A advances money to his agent X to use in buying property for A at a judicial sale, A being a party to a contract to stifle competition at such sale, and X uses part of such fund in buying such property, A can make X account for the residue.²⁵

Where no agency exists, still if A pays X money to be by him paid to B, X cannot set up the illegality of the contract between A and B, and thus retain such money.¹ The same principle applies where B defrauds A out of the proceeds of an unlawful transaction to which B was not a party. Thus if A buys a lottery ticket contrary to law and B obtains it from A by fraud and converts the proceeds to his own use it has been held that A can recover such proceeds from B.²

A stakeholder is one in whose hands the property staked by one or both parties to the wager is placed as a bailment to be delivered to the winner.¹ Either party, including of course, the loser, may rescind the wager and recover the property from maintain an action against the stakeholder after the event and payment on the ground that the stakeholder paid the wrong party.⁸ Under some statutes a stakeholder is liable absolutely to each party for his stake.⁹ A bet on a horse-race with B; C was stakeholder; A won. To induce C to pay him A agreed with X as surety to indemnify C against liability to B. X was obliged to pay C. It was held that X could not enforce the liability against A.¹⁰ Under some statutes it is a misdemeanor to act as stakeholder.¹¹

If the parties to the monopoly contract are satisfied therewith and are willing to perform it, but some third party seeks to take advantage of its illegality, in the absence of statute, such third persons cannot compel parties to the monopoly contract to break it.¹ Thus, where members of an association agree to deal only with parties who comply with their rules, such as not to deal with wholesalers who sell at retail,² or who sell to persons out-

If A acquires property under an illegal contract with B, X cannot seize such property, convert it to his own use, and in an action by A, set up the illegality of the contract whereby A acquired such property.¹ Thus if A has acquired property in an illegal business, he can recover it from B if B embezzles it.² Thus where A agreed to donate certain cotton to a military company to aid the rebellion, and the agent of the company sold the cotton to B, B paying A and A agreeing to hold the cotton to B's order, it was held that though the agreement between A and the company was illegal, the contract between A and B was valid.³ So where A by fraud obtains from B a lottery ticket which has drawn the prize, A is liable to B for the proceeds thereof.⁴

depends in some jurisdictions upon whether the act to be done is known to B to be wrongful.¹ If B knows or must know that the act which he agrees to do is illegal, he cannot enforce the contract to indemnify him from the liability therefor;² while if he does not know or have reason to know that such acts are illegal, he can enforce such contract, even if the act is in fact illegal.³ Thus a promise by an author to indemnify the publisher against damages for the publication of a libel is invalid,⁴ while a similar promise is valid where it does not appear that a libel is intended.⁵ So a promise to indemnify an officer for making a levy apparently lawful, or for selling property taken on execution, though the judgment debtor claims it as exempt,⁶ or a promise to indemnify a garnishee against loss from payment of the fund garnisheed,⁷ is valid; while a promise to indemnify an officer for refusing to execute regular legal process is invalid.⁸ But if there is a doubt as to the ownership of chattels on which an officer is about to levy, a promise by one not a party to the writ who claims to be the real owner to indemnify the officer against loss from leaving such chattels with such claimant is valid.⁹ Where it is a misdemeanor to act as stakeholder in a bet on a trial of speed, a contract to indemnify a stakeholder against liability from surrendering the stakes is invalid.¹⁰ It has been held, however, that in a contract of indemnity for making an arrest, the promisee cannot recover if the arrest was illegal, even though he thought that it was legal.¹¹ A contract to indemnify the master of a ship against all legal expenses which may arise from his chastising the crew has been construed to mean lawful chastisement; and indemnity against the expenses of groundless suits has been enforced.¹² A bond given by a deputy sheriff to whom the sheriff has made an illegal assignment of all unearned fees in a given district has been held valid.¹³

If a contract is merely void as distinguished from illegal, a contract collateral to it and in aid of it is not thereby invalidated. This follows from the rule that a void covenant in an inseverable contract does not invalidate the remaining valid covenants. Thus in jurisdictions in which wagers are merely void, an agent may recover for services rendered or expenses incurred in making wagers for his principal.¹ He must act as agent however; and must not, under guise of agency, be the real adversary party.² So a contract employing an agent to
